Refugees hammer Malawi economy

ZOMBA — Malawi's economy declined 0.2 per cent in 1987/88, compared with 2.0 per cent growth the previous financial year, the Finance Minister, Mr Louis Chimango, said.

He told parliament the poor performance was due to low export prices, sharp rises in prices of imports and transport bottlenecks faced by the landlocked African country.

Presenting the budget, Mr Chimango said inflation increased from 15 per cent to 25 per cent last year but was expected to drop to 20 per cent this year.

He said government expenditure in 1987/88 exceeded revenue by R150 million dollars because of food shortages caused by drought and worsened by an influx of 400,000 Mozambican refugees.

Malawi's economy is totally dependent on agriculture which suffered from severe drought last year, necessitating imports of staple maize.
Chissano praises Malawi's aid

MAPUTO — Mozambican President Joaquim Chissano has praised Malawi's role in helping his country defend itself against rebels of the Mozambican National Resistance.

The official news agency AIM said he had called for stronger unity between Malawi and Mozambique at a meeting with Malawian soldiers in the railway town of Cuamba in Niassa province on Friday.

Malawi has committed an estimated 600 men from its 5,000-strong army to defend the railway line.

The railroad line, built in the early 1970s to link Malawi with the Mozambican port of Nacala 600 km away, has been disrupted by MNR attacks.

AIM said President Chissano had gone to Cuambo to inspect the Mozambican special forces who are being trained by British instructors to protect the line.

The training project is not part of Britain's official military aid to Mozambique — it is run by a private company and the instructors are mostly former members of the elite SAS, the British army's special forces unit.

Malawi had previously been accused by Mozambique of supporting the MNR, but its President, Mr Kamuzu Banda, agreed 18 months ago to help the Frelimo government to defend the Nacala line. — Sapa-Reuter.
Former US consul now ambassador to Malawi

Mr George Trail, a former Consul-General to South Africa, has been appointed United States Ambassador to Malawi.

Mr Trail (51), who is married to a South African, was based in Johannesburg from 1980 to 1984.

During his confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in Washington, Mr Trail said more sanctions "would only serve to isolate South Africa further and further disarm those people within South Africa who have stayed there and courageously worked for change."

INCREASED DIALOGUE

The United States should try to increase its level of dialogue with Pretoria and try to encourage the white minority government to meet the needs of its people, he said.

Mr Trail told the committee Malawi had done a "tremendous job" caring for 500,000 refugees who had fled to Malawi from the civil war in Mozambique, which, in turn, led to heavy demands on Malawi's infrastructure. Therefore, Malawi needed every assistance the US could give it.

Noting that 10,000 miners from Malawi worked in South Africa, Mr Trail said any cut off of the trade route between the two countries via Durban could have a serious effect on Malawi.
Malawi's 24 free years

BLANTYRE — Malawi celebrated 24 years of independence yesterday, and hailed "30 glorious years" under President Kamuzu Banda.

It also renewed friendship with Mozambique, whose President Joaquin Chissano was the chief guest at the festivities — the climax of a nationwide party which began on Saturday to commemorate the homecoming in 1958 of Dr Banda, now 82. He led the country to independence six years later.

He has been at the centre of politics in his country since returning home after nearly 40 years in the United States and Britain.

President Chissano's state visit appeared to seal a rapprochement that began in 1986 after years of hostility caused by Mozambican allegations that Malawi was backing MNR rebels who have been fighting the Maputo government since shortly after independence from Portugal in 1975.

PRESIDENT Botha and two Ministers are visiting Mozambique today and Malawi tomorrow in what is seen as attempts to bring greater realism to inter-state relations in Southern Africa.

Although there is a deep ideological divide between Marxist Mozambique and South Africa, they are trying to establish better relations in economics, transport and security.

The meeting at Songo, a small town in northern Mozambique near the Cahora Bassa hydroelectric scheme, will be the first between President Joaquin Chissano and Mr Botha.

Talks with Banda

Later today Mr Botha, accompanied by Foreign Minister Pik Botha and the Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, will fly to Malawi for discussions with President Hastings Kamuzu Banda. They will return to South Africa tomorrow night.

Today Mr Botha's party will visit Cahora Bassa before the talks with Mr Chissano. The huge Cahora Bassa scheme has been constantly sabotaged by the Renamo rebel movement.

Amongst the matters to be discussed are plans to revive the post-monitoring commission set up in terms of the Nkomati Agreement to deal with border issues.

Later today Mr. Botha, accompanied by Foreign Minister Mr. Pik Botha and the Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, will fly to Malawi for discussions with President Hastings Kamuzu Banda. They will return to South Africa tomorrow night.

Among the matters to be discussed are plans to revive the joint monitoring commission set up in terms of the Nkomati Accord to deal with border incidents. South Africa may also raise the ANC presence in Mozambique, while Mozambique may express misgivings about help to Renamo from elements in South Africa.

Decisive step

The official Mozambican news agency, APM, said in an editorial that Mozambique hoped the Songo meeting would be a decisive step in rescuing the Nkomati Accord.

"It is a further step in the policy of trying to resolve the aggression against Mozambique through dialogue with Pretoria."

South Africa, Mozambique and Portugal recently signed an agreement for the rehabilitation of the Cahora Bassa dam but the agreement still has to be ratified.

It is still not clear how the waterlines linking the dam to South Africa will be protected against rebels.

Delighted

South African diplomats are delighted about the visits, which follow one by an emissary from President Chissano to President Botha. Arrangements for the visits stretched over months.

It is President Botha's first official visit to African states, although he has been to southern Angola to visit troops.

Mr. Botha has maintained that he has often received visitors from other parts of Africa but has never given details. At one stage this year there were plans for a visit to Congo-Brazzaville.

According to diplomats, the visit is meant to illustrate a growing realism and a more sober approach in Southern Africa about the role South Africa and its economic power of the region, can play.

PW jubilant at success of Africa mission

By David Braun and Gerald L'Ange

The State President, Mr PW Botha, met Malawi's life president, Dr Kamuzu Banda, for lengthy talks on the shores of Lake Malawi today.

Mr Botha, two of his senior Ministers and Government officials were jubilant following the success of their meeting with the president of Mozambique, Mr. Joaquim Chissano, near Cahora Bassa yesterday.

A source close to the party said in a telephone interview from Malawi that the South Africans were in jubilant mood at their dinner at the South African ambassador's residence in Lilongwe.

The Mozambique talks appear to have been more successful than expected. An immediate result of the meeting was an acceptance by Mr Chissano of an invitation from Mr Botha to meet in South Africa soon.

The talks between Mr Botha and Mr Chissano lasted so much longer than scheduled yesterday that the South African President was unable to spend the night in Dr Banda's lakeside cottage at Monkey Bay as had been arranged.

According to sources in Malawi, crowds of people lined the streets to watch Mr Botha's motorcade leave for Lilongwe Airport early today.

Mr Botha was to meet Dr Banda for private discussions between 9:30 and 10 this morning. The two heads of state were then to be joined by their Ministers and ambassadors for further talks between 10 and 10:45.

The two presidents were scheduled to take lunch on a launch on Lake Malawi.

Mr Botha was not expected to return to South Africa until later tonight.

"President Chissano's acceptance of Mr Botha's invitation to visit South Africa was announced at the end of yesterday's historic meeting at Songo in the Zambezi Valley."

Breakthrough

At the meeting they pledged to promote peace and co-operation in the region.

No date was announced for the proposed visit, which would represent a major breakthrough in South Africa's efforts to promote closer ties with black Africa.

The Songo summit is in itself regarded as a major advance in South Africa's search for new alliances on the continent.

With warm handshakes and an exchange of gifts, the two leaders signalled the restoration of good relations between their governments after several years of increasing friction.

Before their delegations began formal talks, the presidents met on their own for nearly two hours. The summit meeting in an administration building of the Cahora Bassa hydro-electric project was said by participating officials to have been held in an extremely cordial atmosphere.

In a plenary meeting after the presidential talks, it was agreed to set up expert commissions to deal with transport, labour, economic co-operation, trade and other bilateral issues.

A communique said the presidents reaffirmed their commitment to peace, stability and co-operation.

One of several issues discussed was the question of property expropriated from South African owners in Mozambique.

Other issues included the restoration and reinforcement of the Nkomati Accord, development of road and railway links between the two countries, the upgrading of the Maputo harbour, the supply of power from the Cahora Bassa project, labour relations and the employment of Mozambican mine workers.

At a news conference Mr Chissano said there was new confidence and trust on both sides.

SECRET VISIT
It would be the first State visit by an African head of state to South Africa since President Banda visited Prime Minister Mr B J Vorster.

At least one African head of state is known to have visited President Botha secretly in South Africa in recent times.

The talks between Mr Botha and Mr Chissano lasted so much longer than scheduled yesterday that Mr Botha was unable to spend the night in Dr Banda's lakeside cottage at Monkey Bay as arranged.

The cottage, Shikoko, is about 300km north of Lilongwe.

Mr Botha and his entourage instead spent the night at the residence of the South African Ambassador, Mr George Stroebel, at Lilongwe, and flew to Mauzu airfield, near Monkey Bay, early today.

Cutback in terror attacks unlikely

BY PATRICK LAURENCE

Revving the Nkomati Accord is unlikely to reduce significantly the number of guerillas entering South Africa.

Whatever else it might achieve, the agreement between President Botha and President Joaquim Chissano to revive the Nkomati Accord is unlikely in itself to reduce significantly the number of terror attacks by insurgents in South Africa.

One of the pivotal terms of the accord is the joint undertaking by South Africa and Mozambique not to allow their territories to be used as springboards for insurgent attacks on one another.

Since the signing of the accord in 1984, Mozambique, once a major conduit for ANC guerillas travelling to or from South Africa, has become relatively insignificant as a guerilla transit route.

According to figures released by the Chief of the Security Police, General Johan van der Merwe, less than a half percent of infiltrators from neighbouring countries enter via Mozambique.

INFILTRATION

But some guerillas entering South Africa from Swaziland start their journeys in Mozambique, an intelligence officer told The Star — and 13 percent of terrorists come in via Swaziland, according to General van der Merwe’s figures.

The main infiltration route is through Botswana — nearly 80 percent.

There is a basic requirement for a dramatic decrease in the overall inflow of insurgents disrupt — if not destroy — the "Botswana connection".

So far, President Quett Masire of Botswana has consistently resisted pressure from South Africa to conclude a non-aggression pact along the lines of the Nkomati Accord.

But given if South Africa’s prior quests were realised, a cessation of insurgency would not necessarily follow.

At the time of the Nkomati Accord, Mozambique and Lesotho were important links in the terror trail to and from South Africa.

When the trail was severely disrupted by the accord and nearly two years later by the fall in Lesotho of the pro-ANC regime of Chief Leabua Jonathan — new routes were forged.

HOME TRAINING

The record, according to official statistics, is.

In 1982 there were 56 terror attacks, in 1983 — 64, in 1985 — 136, in 1986 — 230 and in 1987 — 234.

By the end of last month there had been 138 attacks.

The reduction has given rise to cautious optimism in security circles.

The state of emergency is considered to be the reason. The argument is that turbulence in the townships provided a congenial environment for guerrillas to operate and to recruit new members — but the emergency clampdown is steadily restoring quiet to the townships.

General van der Merwe has said that nearly half the guerrillas captured or killed in the first nine months of last year were trained locally, suggesting that the guerilla war might have entered a new phase.
Hopes of swaying Africa rise in Pretoria

By Gerald L'Ange, The Star's Africa News Service

MONKEY BAY (Malawi) — Pretoria officials are optimistic that President Botha's meeting with the presidents of Mozambique and Malawi will encourage African countries that are dealing covertly with South Africa to do so openly.

Mr Botha returned to South Africa last night after meeting President Joaquim Chissano and President Kamuzu Banda.

Evidence of the success of the trip is that not only did President Chissano accept an invitation to visit South Africa, but he and President Banda invited Mr Botha to visit them again.

The hope is that this will have a snowball effect, strongly boosting the Government's efforts to win wider acceptance in Africa.

After the meeting in Mzuzu, Malawi, yesterday between President Banda and President Botha, it was announced that South Africa had agreed to reschedule Malawi's debts to South Africa. The amount involved and the terms were not disclosed.

South Africa also agreed to donate 3,000 tons of maize to Malawi to help feed the large number of refugees from the fighting in Mozambique.

Mr Botha briefed the Malawi leader on his talks on Monday with President Joaquim Chissano at Songo near the Cahora Bassa Dam.

Speaking in the presence of journalists after the meeting, President Banda pledged to continue dealing openly with South Africa despite the criticism his policy has brought from other African states.

Mr Botha's meeting with President Chissano is seen as a particularly promising advance. It is thought to offer hope not only for improving relations with Mozambique but also for opening new diplomatic doors elsewhere in Africa. The meeting is regarded in some official circles as even more promising than the Nkomati Accord itself.

A major purpose of the Songo meeting was to mend the near-fatal damage done to the accord by Mozambique's conclusion that Pretoria had violated the treaty by continuing to help the MNR rebels. President Chissano said he had been given guarantees by President Botha that South Africa would not help the MNR.

If the rebels' depredations continue unabated, Pretoria's problem will be to convince the Frelimo government that it is not aiding them.

New deals with Malawi

MZUZU — President P W Botha met Malawian leader Kamuzu Banda yesterday and agreed to reschedule Malawi’s unspecified debt to SA.

He also said 3,000 tons of SA maize would be provided to help Mozambican refugees in Malawi.

Botha and Banda met in Mzuzu, 300km north of the capital Lilongwe, and discussed bilateral ties and the security and economic situation in southern Africa, said a joint communiqué.

Botha and his party, which included Foreign Minister Pik Botha and Defence Minister Magnus Malan, later flew to Monkey Bay resort on their way home.

Banda pledged to continue open dealings with Pretoria in defiance of most black African opinion.

“I believe in dealing with SA openly,” Banda told a news conference at the end of his meeting with Botha.

Malawi has remained the only state in black Africa that has diplomatic relations with Pretoria.

It was Botha’s first visit to Malawi and, following his trip to Mozambique on Monday, broke new ground in SA’s relations with its black neighbours.

Botha and his entourage received red carpet treatment.

A statement by Foreign Minister Pik Botha said the President had briefed Banda on Monday’s talks with President Joachim Chissano in Mozambique.

After the talks President Botha congratulated President Banda on his clean and efficiently administered country.

Banda said his three most basic goals for his country had been achieved: there was sufficient food for all, everybody was decently dressed and lived in a “house that does not leak”.

Botha meets Chissano, Banda in apparent bid to create stability in sub-continent

Spirits of Nkomati ‘revived’ at Songo talks

The meeting took place in a region long ravaged by fighting between MNR rebels and the Pretoria government. The move came amid escalating military conflict in the region, with reports of violence and displacement affecting thousands of people. Both sides were under pressure to find a peaceful resolution to the conflict.

The meeting, facilitated by Botha, was seen as a significant step towards stability in the region. It marked the first time the two leaders had met, and their discussions were reportedly aimed at finding common ground and reducing tensions.

The meeting was well received, with both sides expressing optimism about the prospects for a peaceful resolution. The leaders agreed to continue dialogue and work towards a lasting peace in the region.

Relations between Malawi and Mozambique are back to normal after the countries reached a mutual state of war two years ago because of allegations that Malawi was supporting the MNR. In July this year, Chissano visited Malawi on an official trip which marked a high point of reconciliation.

Mozambique and South Africa have also acknowledged the importance of regional cooperation and have agreed to work together to address common challenges.

In an unexpected step, Botha announced during the talks with Banda that South Africa would be donating 3,000 tons of maize to Mozambique following the severe drought. The move was seen as a significant gesture of goodwill and support.

The meeting was widely regarded as a positive development in regional relations, with both sides expressing hope for a more stable and prosperous future for the region.

The meeting also reportedly included discussions on the implementation of the Nkomati Accord, which was signed in 1985 to end the fighting in the region.

Convoys keep Malawi's economy ticking over.

Mutanda — Nightfall at Mwanza on Malawi's western border with Mozambique is accompanied by the roar of 40-ton trucks pulling away from the bustling immigration and customs office. They park on the Mozambican side. The drivers drink beer and sleep in the cabs of their trucks to wait for the next day's convoy across Mozambique to the Zimbabwean border.

This road through Tete province is the economic lifeline for landlocked Malawi, which pays a heavy price in foreign currency to the Zimbabwean army to protect it from Renamo attacks.

Since Malawi lost its traditional railway routes to the Indian Ocean ports of Beira and Nacala due to sabotage by Renamo, the Tete road corridor has carried the bulk of the country's exports and imports.

Last year, the road and the only other, much longer, road route south through Zambia carried more than 50% of Malawi's trade.

As the sun rises over the Mozambican border town of Zomba, the trucks begin to roar into life and, under instructions from the Zimbabwean convoy commander, move off for the two-and-half-hour trip to the midway town of Tete.

The first 20-30 km is considered safe since the road runs along the Malawian border. But after that, as one Zimbabwean officer said: "There's nothing but bush, animals and bandits.".

In most convoys there are about 70 vehicles, mostly container trucks, stretching for about five km. From Malawi, they carry tobacco, tea, sugar, groundnuts and other exports.

An armoured personnel carrier containing soldiers armed with automatic weapons and grenade launchers follows after every 10 or so vehicles.

The signs of rebel attacks are numerous. In many places, a band of tarps had been dug up. The shallow holes showed where rebels had placed landmines which had been removed by the army. Most days, say truckers who use this route, the convoy passes without incident. But last week, a driver said, they were attacked by rebels firing from some distance. No one was hurt — Sapa-Reuter.
Banda clampdown on corruption

BLANTYRE — Malawi President Kamuzu Banda on Thursday ordered an immediate dismissal of corrupt civil servants, the Malawi news agency MANA reported.

Speaking at a Christmas party, Banda specifically singled out police officers and immigration officials who received bribes from offenders to evade prosecution.

"We must not tolerate that kind of thing. If you hear anyone is doing such a thing (bribing), sack him. The police force, the army and the civil service in this country must be above suspicion," he said.

Mozambicans to be repatriated

MAPUTO — Mozambique, Malawi and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees have reached agreement on a scheme to voluntarily repatriate the 600,000 Mozambicans now living in Malawi.

The agreement, signed yesterday in Tete, establishes a tripartite commission to deal with people who have fled Mozambique to escape MNR rebel attacks and severe drought.

Repatriation will be carried out in stages to ensure the Mozambicans will be able to return safely to their places of origin.

The accord stipulates that no one will be forced to return unwillingly.

Transport will be provided for those who wish to go home and they will be cleared through border and customs formalities. They will be given food and other aid to allow them to settle down.
Malawians win praise for help

LILONGWE — A visiting US senator has praised Malawi, one of Africa's poorest countries, for its help to more than 600,000 Mozambican refugees.

Senator Paul Simon, chairman of the African affairs subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is on a tour of Zambia, Malawi, Zimbabwe and Nigeria.

"It is an incredible thing this government has done — as far as I can see — without hesitation and without any bitterness," he said on Friday.

"It has been a great illustration of humanity at its best," Simon said the number of refugees in Malawi would be equivalent to an influx into the US of 20-million people.

The Mozambican refugees have fled the civil war in their own country.

Simon said he wanted the US to spend more on foreign aid, particularly to African countries, but some countries discouraged assistance by not being fiscally prudent. Malawi had shown the prudent use of foreign aid, he added.

Black trade mission heads for Malawi

IN THE first trade mission of its type, 30 black SA businessmen will visit Malawi this month as guests of the Malawi Chamber of Commerce.

The trip is being arranged by a firm of black business consultants, WR Consultants.

CE Willie Ramoshaba says those chosen for the trade mission have made a mark in the business arena and have some visible equity behind them.

The aim is to expand each person's market in their existing field and broaden their scope into Africa and beyond. Once in Malawi, they will meet people involved in business and identify a niche for themselves.

Ramoshaba says Malawi traders find themselves in the embarrassing position of having to trade with white SA businessmen and would prefer to deal with black South Africans.

He says Malawi's total trade is R450m a year — 40% with SA.

There is no meaningful black-run manufacturing industry in SA, but SA has a good industrial infrastructure in which blacks could share, says Ramoshaba.

Share the pie

Black importers and exporters will be supporting SA manufacturers by taking on the trading hassles. "We can enlarge the pie and then share it," he says.

Companies trading with Malawi, or planning to, can appoint a person on the trip to research the market for their products. The person will be linked to the company and act as its ambassador.

Ramoshaba says all attempts to develop blacks have been through the informal sector, and while there is room for this, black business should be seen in a broader context.

He believes import and export trade will give blacks an immediate entry into meaningful business.

He says "Disinvestment has excluded the black businessman in SA. We are trying to create a body of black businessmen that people can deal with.

"One deal, if successfully put together, can transform a backyard operator into a millionaire."
Earthquake hits Malawi

Two killed

BLANTYRE — At least two people were killed and about 60 hurt when an earthquake destroyed buildings in central Malawi, officials said yesterday.

They said 24 people were taken to hospital after the tremor in Selima around midnight on Friday. An earlier tremor was felt in the country on Thursday.

In Maputo, state radio said the tremor had also affected two provinces in neighbouring Mozambique, but there were no reports of casualties or serious damage.

In Zimbabwe, the Goetz observatory in Bulawayo said a tremor originating outside the country was recorded on Friday at 11.51pm local time (2151 GMT), measuring 4.5 on the Richter scale, strong enough to cause severe damage in a populated area.

6 drowned in Malawi in raging floods

BLANTYRE — Torrential rain and floods in southern Malawi left six people dead and about 37,000 homeless, government and Red Cross officials said yesterday.

The six dead, including two children, were drowned in floodwaters that swept away mud-built huts and prefabricated shelters in Chikwawa and Nsanje districts, local administrators said.

A government administrator at Nsanje said about 20,000 people were homeless in his district, near Malawi's south-eastern border with Mozambique.

Red Cross officials said 17,000 homeless were receiving relief food and tents at Chikwawa, 110km south of Blantyre.

Some displaced families were housed in schools, churches, government buildings and brick-built trading stores that withstood the flooding, they said.

Travellers arriving in Blantyre from Chikwawa and Nsanje spoke of entire villages being destroyed and widespread damage to corn crops in the worst floods recorded since 1956.

Govt's rescue flood victims

BLANTYRE — Rescue operations have been mounted in Malawi and Zambia to evacuate thousands left homeless and stranded by torrential rains and floods.

In Malawi's worst flooding since 1965, six people have been killed and 47,000 trapped.

Police officials and youth volunteers used canoes and motor launches to rescue stranded families in the central and southern provinces of Nkhata Bay, Chikwawa and Nsanje, a police spokesman said.

In Zambia, the air force is engaged in an airlift to rescue nearly 3,000 villagers trapped on islands in the Mazabuka district. No casualties have been reported.

An estimated 50,000 people have been left homeless since the torrential rains started in January.

Steaming in, armoured, to save Malawi’s economy

Own Correspondent

NAMPULA, northern Mozambique — The first train in almost two years to run all the way from the Indian Ocean to Malawi should arrive, with luck, in that landlocked African state in the next few days.

The re-opening of the line linking Malawi with the Mozambican deepwater port of Nacala will be more than just a triumph of engineering and endurance. It may, in fact, save Malawi’s economy.

Attacks

Since deliberate sabotage by Renamo began to hamper the line’s operations in the mid-1980s and eventually shut it down altogether 18 months ago, Malawi has had to spend 60% of its foreign exchange earnings conducting its trade through distant South African ports.

The effect of this situation on Malawi’s already-battered economy has been catastrophic. In 1997 its economy suffered a net decline for the first time since independence.

Many see the concentration of rebel forces on the railways as strong evidence of South Africa’s continuing support for Renamo, despite official denials.

The timing of Mrs Thatcher’s visit to Malawi is not insignificant. Much of the work that has gone into re-opening the 400-km Nacala line has been paid for by Britain and there are British expatriate directors operating on the ground.

Bill Halpin is the man who runs the railway in the northern Mozambican town of Nampula, headquarters of the Nacala line. A former head of operations for British Rail, his problems now as deputy director-general of the Caminhos de Ferro do Mozambique-Nacala are tropical weather and well-armed guerrillas.

For the past two years he and engineer John Wreford have struggled to keep the track open and the trains running. In spite of the obvious frustrations and discomfits of life in Nampula, they have come to see the re-opening of the line as a worthwhile challenge and they are currently trying to persuade the British Overseas Development Administration to fund them for a further two years.

At the first through-train trundles towards Malawi, in the workshops at Nampula the two Britons are putting together a project they hope will make each trip easier in future.

Bill Halpin explained the project by outlining the two ways that Renamo operates to disrupt the line.

For preference, the guerrillas fire one of the remote bush areas through which the line runs for most of its length. They tear up the short pieces of track, toss them into the bush and burn the wooden sleepers.

A French project to replace the wooden sleepers with concrete ones and long-weld the track to make it impossible to pull up has progressed about a quarter of the way along the line. But, as the general security situation in northern Mozambique has deteriorated in recent months, the French team have refused to continue without permanent protection from the Mozambique military. The government cannot spare a force at the moment, so the project has ground to a halt.

Last week Halpin learned to his disgust that more than 40 metres of track had just been destroyed near Blantyre, halfway to Malawi. His team could repair that in a couple of days, he said, but it all added up to a further delay in resuming full operations.

Where Renamo cannot destroy the track, Halpin says, their practice is to ambush the trains, firing automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades at the driver’s cab.

The drivers tend to flee and the guerrillas then usually light a big fire under the abandoned locomotive which effectively warps the engine frame, putting it completely out of action until John Wreford’s maintenance department can send it back into service.

The tidings at Nampula are full of similarly disabled locomotives.

The important thing, Halpin says, is to prevent the guerrillas from being able to stop them and light their fires.

“Two weeks ago there was an attack on a train between here and Nacala — they fired a rocket which went straight through the cab and out the other side. — It didn’t kill anyone but it killed both the crew on its way through.”

The officer commanding the soldiers on the line had the presence of mind to keep the engine going.

At the workshops at Nampula they are building prototypes of a special weapon — an armoured locomotive.

On advice from the Ministry of Defence in London, the workshops in Nampula have borrowed technology developed in Northern Ireland and are using material from a West Midlands firm which supplies the Ministry.

The driver’s cab on the three-metre Brazilian locomotives is to be encased in 4cm manganese steel, and that armour itself is to be shielded at a distance of about 3m by Kremnich steel — a grid of hardened steel bars that has proved effective on army armoured vehicles in Ulster.

Obvious idea

The theory is that the grill will catch a rocket-propelled grenade before it hits the armour plating and the distance between the grill and the armour will reduce its explosive effect.

It may seem an obvious idea, but for rocket-propelled grenades to penetrate 12 inches of mild steel, a rather special form of protection is required.

The rest of the locomotive will have lower quality armour and mesh — top priority is being given to the driver’s safety.

The Mozambican official for this project is a local company’s managing director, who is both a South African and a Mozambican.

The Mozambican Railways Company is a 50/50 joint venture, the South African side of which is being run by the South African Railways Authority.

By the time this train arrived in Malawi, it will have passed through nine South African railway stations. The local train has run on the Nacala line for its entire history, and is already paying more than R200 000 (about £150 000) for each eight-locomotive train to be armoured in this way.

The British government is likely to put up the money for the armoured train. But it may not be for a simple reason — to improve safety.

The Mozambican drivers are certainly pleased about the idea, even if its effectiveness has yet to be tested in combat.

If the armoured train proves successful, Bill Halpin and John Wreford believe it could be a key factor in winning the railway war.
Surprise visit added to tour

Maggie due in Namibia at weekend

MANDY JEAN WOODS

BRITISH Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher would visit Namibia tomorrow, the first day of UN control in the territory, Foreign Minister Pik Botha confirmed last night.

Botha's announcement came amid speculation this week that Thatcher would make a surprise visit to Namibia — in spite of denials by British and SA officials Thatcher ended her four-nation tour of Africa in Malawi today.

A Foreign Affairs spokesman said government had been consulted about the visit and reacted positively to the suggested visit of Thatcher to the British contingent of UNTAG.

Sapa reports that Thatcher, when asked earlier yesterday if she intended visiting Namibia, said she had no plans for a Namibian stop-over. She said when she was to go somewhere she would make an announcement and “I have no announcement to make.”

Botha said the usual courtesy arrangements had been made to the satisfaction of Thatcher's office and government. He would not say if he would meet Thatcher during his visit to the territory today and tomorrow, in part to oversee the PoW exchange which will bring RIFLEMAN Johan Papenfus back to SA after 11 months of captivity in Havana.

The Foreign Affairs spokesman said although Botha would be in Namibia today “we have no knowledge of a possible meeting with Thatcher. In fact if it comes off we will be surprised. It is just speculation at this stage.”

A British Embassy spokesman said in Cape Town earlier yesterday, Thatcher “had no plans to visit Namibia. She is in Malawi today and is scheduled to leave tonight for London.”

He said the British ambassador to SA, Sir Robin Renwick, was visiting Namibia and was to meet UN special representative to Namibia Maritu Ahtisaari on his arrival at the Windhoek airport this morning.
LILONGWE — An eight-man delegation from Mozambique is in Malawi on a six-day visit to work out ways of repatriating Mozambicans now living in refugee camps here. Malawi is host to more than 600,000 Mozambican refugees.

The delegation, led by Interior Minister Manuel Jose Antonio, has six other members of the Mozambican government and two members from the resident office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees in Mozambique.

Dr. Wilfried Rupprecht promised at the weekend his government would help flood victims in the Chikwawa district of Malawi by sending in food supplies and clothes. An estimated 500,000 people have been made homeless by the floods. — Ano.
Woes for old man Banda

UNUSUAL political activity and open signs of discontent are surface in Malawi.

President Hastings Banda normally keeps a tight lid on any signs of discontent and rarely refers to serious political issues in speeches.

The last few months, however, have seen a departure from these practices.

The first sign of problems for the ageing life president came in February when Banda was making one of his frequent crop inspection tours of outlying areas.

Just before his departure for Mzuzu in the north, he launched a strong attack on teachers, civil servants and businessmen in the northern region.

He accused them of harbouring separatist sentiments and of attempting to subvert his government.

Banda went on to say that the northerners, particularly teachers in the central and southern regions, were abusing their positions by spreading the anti-government message of former Foreign Minister Kanyama Chuma, who fell out with Banda in 1964.

Chuma now leads a small and generally weak exile movement, the Congress of the Second Republic, based in Dar es Salaam.

Mission schools

Banda's unprecedented attack was followed by an order banning northerners from teaching outside their own region.

This will create massive problems, as a large proportion of teachers come from the north. The area has a history of strong educational achievement, partly because of the presence of excellent mission schools.

If northern teachers are sent home, other areas will be left short of qualified personnel. The move will also create enormous resentment among teachers who lose their jobs.

The other sign of growing unrest occurred at one of Banda's most prized creations, the University of Malawi at Zomba.

There were demonstrations in February, sparked off by a draconian regulation providing automatic expulsion for any female student becoming pregnant.

The regulation was followed by the discovery of a human foetus in a university toilet.

Pregnant students

A witch-hunt followed in which all female students were required to have a strict and humiliating medical examination.

The authorities claimed to have discovered several pregnant students and some who had undergone abortions. They were expelled and sent back to their regions.

Banda is nearing the end of his years but shows no sign of loosening his grip on the country or of designating an heir.

Many fear that he still intends John Tembo, treasurer of the Malawi Congress Party, to succeed him.

Tembo is unpopular and it is feared his rise to power could lead to a wave of political unrest and possibly a military coup.

He is particularly hated by the army, which would prefer to see its commander, General Melvin Khanga, or the head of military intelligence, General Lyahmba, in power.

Food deficit

The two recent outbreaks may indicate growing restlessness over the succession and over the steadily worsening economic situation.

The country has a serious food deficit as a result of the presence of 650,000 Mozambican refugees in the border areas, who now make up eight percent of Malawi's total population.

Their presence results partly from Banda's policy of supporting the Mozambican rebels.

SA-born man faces deportation to Malawi

By Mounshwa Moroke

A Tembisa man (30) born in the Transvaal and who has lived there most of his life, has been declared an illegal alien and faces deportation to Malawi.

Mr Denny Hamilton Mhango has been in police custody in Kempton Park since November. He does not want to go to Malawi and believes he is a South African citizen, but authorities have declared him a Malawian.

Representations made by his attorneys to the Government this week met with a discouraging response and if there is no change of heart, Mr Mhango may find himself in Malawi at the weekend — cut off from his widowed mother and family.

His mother, Mrs Tryphina Mhango, has been the legally registered tenant of their home in Tembisa since 1971 and lives there with her other children registered on the permit.

She married her husband, a Malawian, Mr John Maynard Mhango in Middelburg, Transvaal in 1931 where their children were born. Mr Mhango's birth was not registered.

All 10 members of the family moved to Tembisa in 1970.

Mr Mhango attended Morton Lower Primary School in Tembisa, until the end of 1972. His father took him to Malawi to further his education and he received an electronics diploma.

Attorneys for Mr Mhango have informed Home Affairs they traced a school principal who will testify that Mr Mhango attended his school.

While he was in Malawi, a relative of Mr Mhango was issued with identity documents in South Africa in his name, without his consent. The relative, who needed Section 10 rights to stay in the city, is now prepared to testify to this effect.

A Home Affairs spokesman confirmed the arrest and said the initial deadline given to Mr Mhango to prove his citizenship had been extended from April 12 to April 21.
Malawi, SAA ‘in overt link’

GABORONE — Anti-apartheid sources in Africa and Europe say Air Malawi is proposing to enter into a commercial arrangement with SAA.

In terms of this arrangement, an SAA
Boeing 747SP aircraft would be painted in Air Malawi livery and would operate under a suitably contracted lease, the Botswana News Agency reported yesterday.

Co-operation, the sources said, was scheduled to commence on August 1.

The objectives allegedly to operate services from Johannesburg to Europe via Lilongwe without the cost and inconvenience of flying around the African continent, and to the US, where SAA is denied landing rights.

In Johannesburg, an SAA spokesman said the airline had been approached by Air Malawi for assistance in respect of the regional services and with the prostect of developing an international operation.

'It is understood Air Malawi is also in contact with other parties in regard to-possible international operations,' he said.

Rotary aims to spare Malawi’s ‘water patrol’ children

By Winnie Graham

Six-year-old children who walk 14 km a day carrying up to 20 litres of water have prompted the Johannesburg Main Reef Rotary Club to embark on a project which will provide potable water for the people of a Malawi village.

The club has already raised enough money to provide several boreholes. A Rotary club in Sweden has offered to contribute R25 000.

The president of the Main Reef Club, Mr Richard Robinson, said this week the project had been initiated at the instigation of Mr David Ben Be’eri, a Rotarian who had lived in Nigeria, Ghana, Tanzania and Kenya before coming to South Africa.

“He travelled extensively in Africa and reached the conclusion that Africa’s most fundamental problem is the lack of clean water,” Mr Robinson said. “David told us he had seen small children walk 14 km every day fetching and carrying water. The children have no time to learn to play. Their water-carrying chore is a matter of survival.”

Waterholes, he added, were usually infested by bacteria, inhabited by lizards and snails — not always peacefully — with scavenging animals. Diseases such as dysentery, intestinal and digestive illnesses often had fatal results.

A UN study estimates a life expectancy of 35 in the arid regions of Africa.

“Malawi needs about 20 000 wells,” Mr Robinson added. “The Main Reef Rotary Club embarked on this project because we hope that by providing water for the people in just one small region we will alleviate some of the hardship these friendly people have to endure.”

Underground water in Malawi was usually reached at between six and eight metres.

Malawi ‘safari’ for businessmen

ABOUT 100 black businessmen, led by president of the National African Federated Chambers of Commerce Mr Sam Motsuenyane, are to tour Malawi next month.

The tour represents a meaningful attempt by concerned black business entrepreneurs to explore potential import and export opportunities between South Africa and Malawi. According to tour co-ordinator Mr Willie Ramoshaba, who is also chief executive of WR Consultants, the purpose is to broaden the horizon of our black business people and to expose them to meaningful business opportunities in Africa.

The safari mission is a result of numerous behind-the-scenes manoeuvres by Natcou in its thrust to foster and encourage business opportunities among its members.

The scheduled tour programme covers virtually all meaningful business parts of Malawi, stretching from the capital Lilongwe, through the business heart of Malawi Blantyre into the hotel is resort of Lake Malawi.

During the visit the Minister of Finance of Malawi is scheduled to officially open the one-day conference of the estimated 200 Malawian and South African businessmen people on June 10.

A number of Malawian and local speakers, including Motsuenyane will also address the conference.

The group will meet government officials, bankers, industrialists, farmers and other businessmen.

Ramooshaba did not rule out the possibility of the group meeting exiled leaders of South African political organisations.

The cost of the trip is R250 per people who will share and R2850 for single persons. Contact WR Consultants for further information at (011) 331-7454.
Black businessmen on Malawi trade venture

By Jabulani Sikhakhane

In an attempt to expand their share of the economic cake, black businessmen are exploring opportunities of getting into the import and export trade — mainly with neighbouring African countries.

Next Wednesday sees a group of about 100 black businessmen leave on a business tour of Malawi to explore opportunities of doing trade with their Malawian counterparts.

The tour hosted by the African Businessmen's Association of Malawi, comes soon after several business trips to Africa by delegations from the National African Federated Chambers of Commerce Nafoc has also twice visited Japan to explore business opportunities with Japanese firms operating in SA.

The Malawian tour organised by business consultant, Willie Ramoshaba, has the support of the country's black business and professional organisations.

Leading the tour is Dr Samuel Motsumaneyane, president of Nafoc, who will also address a seminar on "the need for economic co-operation among blacks in the sub-Saharan region."

Other organisations backing the tour are Sabia, the Association of Black Accountants of SA, AChib and six other organisations who will each send a representative.

The rest of the tour will be spent looking at regulations on import/export of goods between Malawi and South Africa, possible areas of co-operation between Malawian and SA black business professionals, the available sources of finance for export and import trade between the two countries and vasting specific industries in Malawi.

The purpose of the tour, says Ramoshaba, is to expose black businessmen to trade opportunities in Malawi. They will also attend an all-Africa trade fair which will give them opportunities to identify goods for importing to South Africa.

Malawi groans under weight of refugees

Twenty thousand fugitives from Mozambique cross into impoverished Malawi each month, yet all are made welcome as ‘brothers and sisters’. MIKE HALL reports

ONE person in 12 in Malawi is now a Mozambican, and there seems to be no end to the stream of refugees fleeing the brutal bush-war across the border.

About 100 “half-naked and starving” Mozambicans are arriving every day at Mankokwe, the largest refugee camp in Malawi, a district official said.

Last week about 2 000 people crossed Malawi’s south-western border after a nearby resettlement camp for internally-displaced Mozambicans had been repeatedly attacked by Renamo rebels.

The United Nations high commissioner for refugees says the monthly average over the last year has been 20 000 which takes the total refugee population to a staggering 660 000 by the end of May.

But the government of Life President Kamuzu Banda has made it clear that Malawians will continue to welcome their “brothers and sisters” from Mozambique.

This is despite the considerable burden on their poor and already densely populated country, where this year alone some 1.5-million Malawians are themselves also in need of aid after a series of natural disasters destroyed homes and crops earlier this year.

Now that the rainy season is over it appears that military activity in Mozambique has been stepped up.

This time last year some 140 000 refugees entered Malawi over a two-month period as the Frelimo government launched an offensive against Renamo.

Malawi had to cope with those caught in the cross-fire. Relief agencies were severely stretched to provide for the newcomers. This year

Malawi’s long border with Mozambique they are better prepared. “We don’t want to be caught short again,” said one relief official.

Malawi is the only country in the region to actively welcome Mozambicans. In South Africa they are treated as illegal immigrants. And both Zimbabwe and Zambia suspect Renamo rebels of disguising themselves as refugees.

The huge influx has placed a considerable burden on Malawi, according to the government officials Western aid agencies, including the World Bank, agree.

The refugee programme has pushed up transport costs; food convoys have reduced good roads to pot-holed tracks; maize reserves were long ago depleted and scarce resources have been diverted to providing for the health educational and other needs of the refugees.

In the southernmost district of Nsangwe, the 230 000 Mozambicans now outnumber the Malawian population by three to two.

Across the country, refugees have settled on scarce agricultural land and cut down thousands of hectares of trees for fuelwood.

“I’m amazed at the way the Malawians put up with it,” said one foreign relief worker. “In other countries you find a great deal of animosity between refugees and local people.”
94 on business safari

ABOUT 94 black business people and business organisations, and politicians including Malawian President, Kamuzu Banda, arrived last night at Jan Smuts after a week-long visit to Malawi.

Addressing a crowd of people after their arrival, co-ordinator of the trip, Mr W R Ramoshaba, said the journey was an eye-opener. They met with various people including community leaders.

He also announced that Nacrco president, Mr Sam Motsuenyane who was due to arrive with them last night, has gone on yet another "safari" to Zambia.
Malawi offers export scope for black business

By Jabulani Sikhakhane

Provision for small businessmen to enjoy benefits from the trade agreement between Malawi and South Africa should be made in the new agreement to be signed soon by the two countries.

This is one of the proposals made during a business tour of Malawi by a group of South African black businessmen.

The tour was backed by 15 black businesses, professional and service organisations and led by the president of the National Federated Chambers of Commerce (Naftoc), Dr Samuel Motsuenyane.

Willie Ramoshaba, the tour organiser and MD of WR Business Consultants, said that SA's black businessmen and their Malawian counterparts felt that the revised trade agreement between the two countries should accommodate small businessmen.

"Specific provisions must be made for the small businessmen in both countries to enjoy the benefits of the new agreement. For instance, a certain portion, about 10 percent of the volume of trade between the two countries, could be set aside for small businesses in terms of the available foreign currency and product categories.

"A need was also identified for the financial institutions to devise schemes to finance export/imports by the small businessmen. In SA one would be looking at the financial institutions, the Small Business Development Corporation and the Development Bank of SA to come out with tailor-made financial packages for import/export," Ramoshaba said.

There is also a need for simplified export and import procedures to make the entry of the small businessmen to the import/export trade easy. A directory of services and goods that both countries require would make life easier for the small businessmen.

Ramoshaba said five black businessmen had concluded meaningful business deals with their Malawian counterparts during the tour and would be going back to Malawi to tie up further loose ends.

"The primary objectives of the tour were to expose SA black businessmen to potential business opportunities in Malawi, look at Malawi's business practices and see if there were any lessons for us, look at import and export regulations and explore possible areas of joint business ventures."

"Black businessmen in SA have developed to the level where something drastic and imaginative has to be done to save them. They service a small dwindling market which has limited business capacity. There is the growing need to look for something new and the import/export market is one possible area," he said.
Malawi not ashamed of its ties with Pretoria

LONDON — A glance along the shelves of any PTC Kwiksave, the main supermarket chain in Malawi, reveals that it is not a country ashamed of its commercial links with white-ruled South Africa. From wine to skin-lightening cream, a substantial array of the Republic's products greets the shopper.

This is no surprise. Not only is Malawi the only African country to host a fully fledged South African embassy, but SA food giant, Scope, has a majority holding in People's Trading Centre, which owns Kwiksave.

Despite its active membership of the SADCC, which aims to reduce member states' dependence on SA, Malawi's links with Pretoria are strong.

This month there was a huge South African stand at Malawi's second international trade fair, a four-day visit from Trade Minister Danie Steyn, and a week-long visit, the first of its kind to any African country, by a group of 94 black South African business people.

Soon after independence in 1964, President Kamuzu Banda broke with the fledgling Organisation of African Unity by advocating a policy of "contact and dialogue" with Pretoria.

In 1957, a trade agreement, intended to provide greater market access for Malawian exports, was signed with SA.

Relations between the two countries remain close, although Malawi's SADCC membership illustrates the government's view that links with its neighbours are at least as important as ties with Pretoria.

Despite its active membership of the Southern Africa Development Co-operation Conference (SADCC), Malawi's links with South Africa are strong. Here MIKE HALL of the Financial Times assesses SA's influence on the commerce of Dr Banda's country.

South Africa is Malawi's largest source of imports, accounting for 35 percent of the total in 1987, according to Malawi government figures.

Fuel, fertiliser, chemicals and machinery make up the bulk of SA imports, which in 1987 totalled about R260 million. Exports from Malawi are mainly tea, tobacco and other primary commodities, and amounted to about R78 million.

Wheat flour is an increasing Malawian import. SA subsidies mean it is cheaper for Malawi to import than to grow and mill wheat at home.

The trade imbalance is believed to be the reason Malawi has been renegotiating its trade agreement with SA. Negotiations started almost three years ago, say Malawian officials. South African sources say they are close to signing.

Malawi is almost totally dependent on South African transport routes. More than 80 percent of trade goes via road and rail to and from Durban.

Links with Pretoria remain a potential source of controversy, but Malawian officials and traders take a pragmatic view. "It makes economic sense," says a local businessman. "South Africa is close — it's quicker, cheaper, and usually more efficient."
Malawians celebrate 25 years of autonomy

WITH military pomp and spectacular displays, Malawi celebrated 25 years of independence from British colonial rule on Thursday.

Tribal warriors clad in animal skins and buxom women "Mbumba" dancers of the ruling Malawi Congress Party gyrated to traditional drums and the sound of military marches at Kamuzu Stadium in Blantyre.

Hassan Ali Mwinyi, on the first official visit to Malawi by a Tanzanian head of state, joined the dancers in ceremonies praising Malawian President Hastings Kamuzu Banda.

Banda, wearing his characteristic dark business suit and homburg hat, waved a lion-hair fly-whisk, a traditional symbol of authority.

Mwinyi's presence, with Tanzanian ruling party officials and traditional dancers, indicated a major thaw in relations between the two ideologically-opposed African nations.

Banda, a capitalist, has frequently accused socialist Tanzania of harboured Malawan dissidents bent on overthrowing his pro-Western government.

Authoritarian

The authoritarian Malawan leader, believed to be in his nineties, accompanied Mwinyi in an open jeep to Thursday's celebrations, attended by about 120,000 people.

Malawian women wore cotton clothing emblazoned with Banda's portrait.

Earlier, 3,000 "born free" Malawan children - those born after independence on July 6, 1964 - waved coloured placards depicting economic progress.

Tanzania has been among the African nations that have criticized Malawi, one of Africa's poorest states, for maintaining full diplomatic relations with Israel, South Africa and Taiwan.

Banda returned to Malawi in 1958 after working as a medical doctor in Britain and the United States for nearly 40 years.

He was imprisoned for a year by British colonial authorities but became his nation's first black Prime Minister in 1962.

In 1977, Banda declared Malawi a one-party state.

Mwinyi on first visit to Malawi

TANZANIA'S President Ali Hassan Mwinyi returned home on Friday after his first visit to Malawi.

The visit brought a new warmth to the once-troubled relations between the two neighbours.

During the trip Mwinyi joined President Kamuzu Banda in celebrating Malawi's 25th anniversary of independence.

Candidate for Power Starts Cleaning the Way

BY CAROLINE MONROE

The President of Malawi, Dr. Hastings Banda, has declared his intention to run for re-election in 1984. In an interview with The Independent, he said: "I believe in the power of the people and their participation in the decision-making process." His message is clear: "Let us work together for the betterment of our country."
Leading Malawi poet in jail for two years

By CAROLINE MOOREHEAD

Malawi’s best-known poet, Jack Mapanje, has been in solitary detention in Mochyu Prison, near Zomba, for exactly two years.

He has never been charged and the government refuses to explain why it is holding him.

Malawi is a country where freedom of speech does not exist.

It has been ruled since independence in 1964 by President Hastings Banda, an octogenarian who leads the sole permitted political organisation and who has had himself declared president for life, in which capacity he can order indefinite detentions.

Dr Mapanje has upset the authorities by writing verse in which criticism of Dr Banda and his party is only thinly disguised. He is also the author of many mocking metaphors that have entered Malawi’s vocabulary.

Jack Mapanje was born in southern Malawi in 1943. After taking a first degree at home, he went to London University for a master’s degree in philosophy and then a doctorate. He is a poet and a distinguished theoretical linguist, and he is the head of the English department at the University of Malawi.

Until 1981, Dr Mapanje managed to outwit the censors. But that year his collection of poems, “Of Chameleons and Gods”, was published and though no one was prosecuted for having a copy, the bookshops were not allowed to display it.

Then, in 1986, when Dr Mapanje was planning to bring out a second volume, provisionally entitled, “Out of Bounds”, and take up a post at the University of Zimbabwe, the police seized his manuscripts and arrested him.

Until this summer, he was allowed no visits, but it is thought he has now been able to see his wife and at least one of his three children. — The Independent, London.
Sea link is open again

BLANTYRE - Malawi's shortest and cheapest route to the sea, the Nacala railway line through Mozambique, has officially re-opened for the first time in five years of rebel sabotage.

The Government has urged Malawi's merchants to re-route external trade through the Indian Ocean port of Nacala which is only 815km from this land-locked country - a distance three times shorter than the current route through Durban, South Africa.

Tobacco, tea and sugar are the main exports likely to be transported on the Nacala line.

Tobacco alone earned 60 percent of this impoverished nation's export income last year. But it should yield even more when sailed through Nacala.

Test

No goods have yet travelled on the line that re-opened last week. But armour-plated locomotives have made test runs since late May.

Since 1984, Malawi's traditional rail routes to the Indian Ocean ports of Nacala and Beira have been closed because of repeated attacks by right-wing Mozambique rebels fighting the government in Maputo, the capital of neighbouring Mozambique.

Malawi's shipping interests were concerned about the success of the new route. Many prospective shippers fear the new route will prove a "white elephant" because it will never carry more than a quarter of Malawi's trade over a longer, difficult and more expensive route.

Once the Nacala line is at full steam, it would be able to carry more than three-quarters of Malawi's trade and cut its transport bill by two-thirds, said a railways spokesman. Šapa.

Costly

Until now, Malawi paid one of the costliest transport bills in the world, amounting to more than 100 million US dollars (R400 million) last year

Freight will be transported in stages by road to Lake Malawi, container vessel across the waters, highway to the Tanzanian border and then by Tazara railway to the port of Dar es Salaam.

Many prospective shippers fear the new route will prove a "white elephant" because it will never carry more than a quarter of Malawi's trade over a longer, difficult and more expensive route.

Once the Nacala line is at full steam, it would be able to carry more than three-quarters of Malawi's trade and cut its transport bill by two-thirds, said a railways spokesman. Šapa.
Malawi's almost total dependence on South African railways and ports will be considerably reduced once Malawi's exports start being transported through the port of Nacala in northern Mozambique.

The railway line was closed in 1984 after the Mozambican rebel movement Renamo stepped up its attacks in the northern province of Nampula through which the line runs.

Traditionally, landlocked Malawi exported 90 percent of its goods through the 1,600 km line to Beira or the alternative 800 km route to Nacala. After Mozambique's independence in 1975, the Nacala railway line assumed a vital importance for Malawi because the line to Beira was affected by the border war between Mozambique and Rhodesia.

In 1986, Nacala took 745,000 metric tons of Malawian traffic but this was reduced to 274,000 tons in 1988, the year before the railway line became operational.

The closure of the Nacala line meant that Malawi had to use the much longer 4,000 km rail link to Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Zimbabwean troops were deployed in the north-western Mozambican province of Tete to protect truck convoys travelling from Zimbabwe into Malawi via that war-torn Mozambican province.

At the same time, plans were drawn to build a 65 km road linking Malawi to the Tazara railway line between Tanzania and Zimbabwe in an effort to diversify the foreign trade route from the longer and more expensive transport network to Tanzania.

Several western countries also agreed to finance a $110 million (R297 million) "Northern Corridor" involving 730 km of the Tazara railway line and a 250 km road to be operational by 1992.

But the war in Mozambique was not only throwing Malawi's economy into disarray, it was having a negative impact on its foreign relations.

In 1986, relations between Mozambique and Malawi plunged after the Maputo authorities accused Malawi of supporting the rebel movement.

Malawi denied the allegations, saying it was not logical that it would support Renamo's guerrilla activities which had almost doubled the costs of its imports and exports, and was causing delays in its foreign trade with adverse internal consequences.

It pointed out that 70 percent of its exports were tea and tobacco which could be exported more cheaply and easily through Mozambique.

Mozambique and Zimbabwe, however, threatened to close their borders with Malawi if the alleged support continued, and in October 1986, when President Samora Machel died in a plane crash in South Africa, Pretoria claimed that documents found in the plane's wreckage showed that there was a Mozambican and Zimbabwean plan to overthrow the Malawian government.

Relations between the two countries improved dramatically that December when Malawi and Mozambique signed an agreement on defence and security matters.

The following year, about 200 Malawian troops were deployed along the Nacala railway line as a contribution to its defence. A private British security firm was hired to train a militia charged with defending teams rebuilding the line with western funds.

In announcing the reopening of the Nacala railway line, Malawi Cabinet secretary Mr. Justin Malewesi said trade through Nacala would help the country's economy and cut inflation.

Canada, Portugal, France, Italy and the European Community contributed about $170 million (R459 million) to fund the rebuilding of the line.

The announced reopening of the line comes two months after Renamo said it would halt attacks.

The border between Malawi and Mozambique is an open one and for years people have moved back and forth to trade and visit relatives. But in 1986, the number of Mozambican refugees arriving in Malawi dramatically increased. Most of the Mozambicans come from a rural background and many share ethnic links with the Malawian population among whom they have settled. Malawians have opened their homes to the refugees and shared their resources. But Malawians are poor and small and cannot cope with the number of refugees who need to build their homes and feed their families. In the first few months, the number of refugees arriving in Malawi has doubled from 5,500 a month as the first half of 1990 to 12,000 a month since August. Most of the refugees are women and children. Many of the men may have been killed or forced into the military forces back in Mozambique. The International Committee of the Red Cross refugee camp, 63 Mozambicans arrived only three weeks ago. They had walked for three days, ate their food and were weak and hungry when they reached the camp. The number of arrivals in Malawi is directly related to the continuing violence inside Mozambique.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) has listed ten serious problems for the first couple of years and its refugee program will have to cope with. Because of a lack of land in the country, the refugees are not able to grow their own food, they depend on assistance from the international community. Shortages of food staples have led to increased malnutrition among refugee children. The supply of water in the camps won’t be sufficient. Shortages of firewood and the grass used to thatch the houses mean that refugees have to walk further and further in search of these materials. Many walk back to Mozambique to search of grass and firewood. But by now, the camps are still active and in many areas, there are land mines.

The next day the women were cooking their food for lunch. The refugees from the camp were killed by rains in Mozambique when they were forced to feed wood. The churches in Malawi have received the refugees. The Christian Council of Malawi (CCM) has several programs for the refugees. In response to the desperate need of the refugees as soon as they arrive, they have built transit shelters where the refugees can stay while they build their houses. When they arrive, refugees are given 14 poles to build their houses, but must find the grass for thatching and construct them themselves.

UNHCR called for a rapid increase among refugee children. The supply of water in the camps won’t be sufficient. Shortages of firewood and the grass used to thatch the houses mean that refugees have to walk further and further in search of these materials. Many walk back to Mozambique to search of grass and firewood. But by now, the camps are still active and in many areas, there are land mines.

The story of the Mozambican children is a sad but heartbreaking and appalling in the violence which they have seen. After a few months in the camps with inadequate food and medical care, most of them look like normal children.

Psychological

But the people who work with the children say that the deep psychological scars caused by the violence.

They tell of Mozambican children who have seen their parents murdered, their homes burned, of children who have been forced into Mozambique’s armies and forced to commit atrocities. As a result of such difficulties, UNHCR’s funding for education has been reduced. In Kamwendo refugee camp, which has about 45,000 refugees, there are eight primary school classrooms where classes are taught in three shifts. But each of the 29 teachers has between 140 and 160 students. There are no tables, books, paper or pencils. The teachers share Mozambican curricular materials with each other, taking turns copying lessons onto the board. Most of the children are unable to attend school, those who can often don’t have the opportunity.

Talents

Mr. Anthony Akech, director of the Refugee Studies Centre at the University of Dar es Salaam, is concerned about the education of refugees but also more concerned about the lack of any kind of secondary school for the few thousand Mozambican refugees in Malawi.

These children are Mozambique’s future. Mozambique needs their talents and their energies to rebuild the country. Most of the refugees have been here for four years, they may stay for another four years.

If some of them have a chance to get education here in a secondary school, what will that mean for the future of the country? Who will be the business leaders and the engineers of the country? Who will Mozambique’s leadership come from in the 1990s?

As long as the old forces continue to terrorize villages and to destroy the country’s infrastructure, Mozamian refugees will continue to arrive in Malawi and other countries.

A human tragedy unfolds

Refuge camps in Nsanje; Muluzi and Chilinga camps in Mulanje; and the Chiumbangame, Kalanje and Mwawa camps in Mangochi, the southern part of Malawi.

In Nsanje there are 262,445 refugees in both camps—compared to 201,311 Malawians.

Mankhokwe can no longer take new arrivals, who come in at a rate of up to 300 a day. Instead, they are referred to Nyamthuthu where 75,000 refugees live.

Muluzi and Chilinga camps, which were capable of accommodating 3,000 and 6,485 refugees respectively, have been closed to new arrivals.

So far, 5,100 of these refugees have been transferred to Chifunga camp in Mwanza district, according to United Nations official Joke Langenkamp.

Chiumbangame and Mwawa camps in Mangochi, which hold 15,466 and 4,304 refugees respectively, were also closed to new arrivals.

Newcomers were being referred to Kalanje camp in the same district, where there are already 12,029 refugees.

Kalanje can only support a maximum of 15,000 and soon the camp will be rejecting new arrivals, UN officials said.

Refugees scattered throughout the country represent 10 percent of Malawi’s population.

Mozambicans have always sought refuge in Malawi even during colonial days when the Portuguese ruled their country.

Each time they were confronted by unbearable circumstances at home, they simply crossed the border.

However, never in the history of Malawi has the refugee population been as high as now—ANO.
Malawi: Victorian values and ruthless dictatorship

Far from being the stable model of an independent African nation, it is often held out to be, Malawi is a poor, forgotten country in the grip of a dictator. According to the respected African Watch, Andrew Meldrum's report at the time, carried out by the independent and reliable Hambal and investigations by African Watch and Hastings Kamuzu Banda.

Africa Watch describes Malawi's political system as the most repressive in the world, suppression of opposition, lack of freedom of speech, and media control. The Malawian government has been described as one of the most repressive in the world, with a strict control of information and the media. The government has been accused of arbitrarily detaining and torturing political opponents.

Dr. Tausi, the Prime Minister, was arrested and imprisoned for his outspoken criticism of the government in early 1964. However, his detention is not unusual in Malawi, where the government has a history of arbitrary detentions and imprisonments.

Banda ‘like Ceausescu’ in Malawi

Own Correspondent

JOHANNESBURG. — Western governments should pressure Malawian President Kamuzu Banda to end gross human-rights violations under his iron-fist 26-year-old rule.

The call was made by the human-rights organisation Africa Watch, which compared President Banda, in his 80s, to executed Romanian dictator Nicolae Ceausescu.

A hard-hitting new investigation shows a chilling catalogue of political assassinations, corruption, persecution and civil-rights abuses.

The 116-page report, released yesterday by Africa Watch, also states for the first time that Malawian police shot dead more than 20 people in Lilongwe in March this year. They were said to be protesting against corruption.

The massacre is one of many brutal incidents documented during what is described as “the systematic suppression of dissidents” under the rule of Life-President Hastings Banda.

Africa Watch, an international group established in 1988 to monitor and promote respect for human rights in Africa, compiled the report from extensive interviews with exiled Malawians, and from library material on laws, parliamentary records and censorship lists.

Releasing the report, the group called on Western governments to put pressure on President Banda’s government to end more than a quarter of a century of “gross” human-rights abuses.

“In common with the now-defunct regimes of Eastern Europe, Malawi is a totalitarian state where independent associations — indeed all the manifestations of civil society — are effectively forbidden,” says the report.

It claims Malawi’s stability has been bought at a terrible cost of human lives and forced to endure years of detention without trial. Intellectual life can scarcely survive the dead hand of the censor and political life is non-existent outside the omnipotent ruling party. The best and brightest of Malawians are eliminated from the scene.”

Power, once solely held by the aged President Banda — thought to be in his 80s, although his exact age is unknown and it is illegal for Malawians to speculate on it — is now effectively shared by his “official hostess”, Ms Cecilia Tamanda Kadzamira, and her uncle, Mr John Tembo, says the report.

Report indicts ‘despotic’ Banda

A hard-hitting new report on Malawi catalogues political assassinations, corruption, persecution and civil rights abuses.

The 116-page report, released this week by the Africa Watch group, reveals for the first time that Malawian police shot dead more than 20 people in Lilongwe in March this year.

The massacre is one of numerous brutal incidents — many have never emerged before — documented during what is described as “the systematic suppression of dissenters” under the 26-year rule of Life-President Hastings Kamuzu Banda.

Africa Watch, an international group established in 1983 to monitor and promote respect for human rights in Africa, compiled the report from extensive interviews with exiled Malawians, as well as using library material on laws, parliamentary records and censorship lists.

In releasing the report, the group called on Western governments to exert pressure on Banda’s government to end more than a quarter of a century of “gross” human rights abuses.

“Titled Where Silence Rules, the report likens the all-powerful personality cult of Banda to the dynastic tyrannies of North Korea and Romania.”

In common with the now-defunct regimes of Eastern Europe, Malawi is a totalitarian state where independent associations — indeed all the manifestations of civil society — are effectively forbidden.

“It is at the same time a personal despotism in which the state apparatus is directly answerable to one man. Although many states in sub-Saharan Africa suffer from greater political violence than Malawi, there are few African countries with such a combination of totalitarianism and personal despotism.”

Pro-Western Malawi — long held up as a model of stability and democracy in Africa — is in reality “proof that repression can work.”

“Charges of torture, murder, religious and political persecution, racial discrimination and manipulation of justice are detailed at length in the report.”

Power, once solely held by the aged Banda — thought to be in his 80s, although his exact age is unknown and it is illegal for Malawians to speculate on it — is now effectively shared by his “official hostess,” Cecilia Tamanda Kadzamira, and her uncle, John Tembo.

Dozens held as Malawi cracks down on the north

LILONGWE — Dozens of Tumbuka tribesmen have been arrested in recent months in a crackdown on Malawians of northern origin.

They are accused of being more interested in developing their own region than the rest of the country.

"Other northerners arrested with them are simply said to be "critical of the government" of Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda, still in firm control as Life President."

One of these supposed critics is Mr Thozia Khonde, 42, an area manager with the Sugar Company of Malawi.

Mr Khonde is being held without charge or trial in Mikeya Prison, Zomba. He was arrested on February 29 last year with two friends at Nchalo Trading Centre.

A government informer, of whom there are said to be dozens, apparently overheard a conversation in which Mr Khonde said Dr Banda's instructions that teachers from the north should be sent back there and not allowed to teach in the south could lead only to the collapse of Malawi's education system.

"Most of the country's teachers are from the north."

For years President Banda has been accusing northerners of plotting secession. He has frequently complained that northern teachers go south in order to "teach badly."

"This hostility towards the north has led to the arrest of dozens of prominent civil servants, teachers, students and even the country's only neurosurgeon, Dr George Mafu."

But northerners are not the only victims. In the Seventies thousands of Jehovah's Witnesses were detained when Dr Banda declared them to be endangering good government.

All these supposed government critics are held under Malawi's 1956 Public Security Regulations, which allow for administrative detention orders.

Theoretically, these are meant to be reviewed every six months. In practice they seldom are and detainees are held for years without a hearing.

Reports of torture in prison are common and some prisoners are known to have died — The Independent, London.
Malawian products now exempt from duty in SA

CAPE TOWN — A new trade agreement between SA and Malawi, providing duty-free entry into SA for all products of Malawian origin, was signed yesterday.

This was announced in a statement by Trade, Industry and Tourism Minister Kent Durr.

Surcharge

He said certain agricultural products could, however, only be imported on the authority of a permit issued by the Agriculture Department, or, in the case of coffee, tea and sugar, by the Department of Trade and Industry.

Of particular value to Malawi was a commitment by SA to allow the import of at least 300 000 kg of tobacco a year.

All imports from Malawi were also now free of import surcharge.

It was important to note that the new trade agreement contained a safeguard clause enabling SA's government to take effective action, if necessary, against disruptive imports from Malawi.

Durr said he expected the new trade agreement to contribute towards the further development of relations with Malawi.

Replacing an agreement operating since 1987, it was signed at a ceremony in Cape Town by Durr on behalf of SA's government, and Malawi's Trade, Industry and Tourism Minister R W Chirwa.

The new agreement came into force yesterday.

Durr said SA's favourable balance of trade with Malawi was about R200m a year.

The new agreement would give Malawi an opportunity to reduce this imbalance. — Sapa.
HARARE - Malawian President Hastings Kamuzu Banda left Harare for his country yesterday after paying a seven-day official state visit to Zimbabwe, Ziana national news agency reports.
Malawi exiles poised for 'guerilla action'

BELFAST — The exiled Malawi National League has formed a military wing and is ready to stage military operations against President Kamuzu Banda's government, says a spokesman.

Dr. Chakwera, who was in Britain on a trip to an unnamed African country, would not say where the guerillas were based but did confirm that the military wing was known as the People's Liberation Army of Malawi (Pla).

He said action would be taken later this month when President Banda left the country to attend Zimbabwe's independence celebrations.

He claimed that the Malawian army was backed by South African and Israeli intelligence officials. They worked with the Malawian security force.

Dr. Chakwera also claimed that the Mozambican Renamo rebel group continued to have bases in Malawi.

He alleged that the Malawian government, routinely tortured and killed political opponents.
BLANTYRE - The Malawi government ordered two Blantyre-based western reporters to leave by midnight but gave no reasons for the expulsions.

Mike Hall (27) of Britain and Melinda Ham (25), a Canadian, said the government had cancelled their residence permits on Monday and gave them five days to leave.

Hall, a reporter for the British Broadcasting Corporation, Reuters and the London Financial Times, and Ham, a stringer for the Associated Press and specialist African magazines, were first expelled on October 17 last year but allowed to return three weeks later.

No official reason was given for that decision.

In October 1988, the two reporters were the first western journalists to receive government accreditation to work in this southern African nation since the expulsion of a British correspondent 17 years earlier.

Since the former British colony of Nyasaland became independent Malawi in 1964, Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda has shunned media attention and curbed the activities of the local press.

Several Malawian journalists have been detained without trial and others have fled their homeland, alleging widespread human rights violations.

The United States has criticised Malawi's human rights record but recently described the presence of Hall and Ham there as "a positive development" - Sapo-AP.
Clampdown on foreign media staff in Malawi

KAMPALA — The government has cancelled the work permits of all foreign correspondents and local journalists working for foreign media and ordered them to re-apply for accreditation.

There are 15 correspondents and local stringers for foreign media in the East African nation.

Radio Uganda quoted Mr Ben Otto, permanent secretary in the Ministry of Information, as saying on Thursday the government wanted to streamline the practice of journalism by both groups.

It was not immediately clear if the order was related to government charges that two local journalists defamed Zambia's President Kenneth Kaunda at a news conference on January 29.

Seditious article

A Kampala court dismissed the charges on Tuesday after defence attorneys pointed out that the statute under which they were brought required publication of the defamation.

But Alfred Okware (34) of the independent monthly magazine Newsdesk was held on another charge of being in possession of a seditious article. Festo Ebong (29) of the government-owned New Vision was re-arrested without charge when leaving the court.

At the news conference, Okware asked President Kaunda why he didn't consider relinquishing Zambia's presidency after 25 years in power.

Ebong asked Mr Kaunda why Zambia's national airline flies from Johannesburg to New York when the president is in the forefront of those calling for sanctions against South Africa. — Sapa-AP.
Victim of power struggle

A MASSACRE on the Tete road in Mozambique last week and the effective closure of this road route between Zambia and Malawi has put Malawi right in the middle of the power struggle between Frei mo and Renamo.

When the Zimbabwean army was providing the escort through the Tete Corridor, up to 150 trucks a day were crossing the 260 km section through Mozambique, carrying most of Malawi’s imports and exports and transporting tons of food for the 800,000 Mozambican refugees in Malawi.

But the partial cease-fire agreement reached by Freimo and Renamo saw Zimbabwean troops confined to the Beira and Limpopo corridors, and the last Zimbabwe army troops pulled out of Tete on December 21.

Renamo maintained they had a separate agreement with Malawi regarding the Tete route and for a few weeks after the ending of the convoy system, trucks sped through Tete province, making two or three return journeys a week. The flow of goods was largely uninter rupted until January 9, when a Malawian tanker was caught in a Renamo ambush directed against Freimo forces on the road.

The next day four heavy vehicles were attacked, crew and passengers were killed, and vehicles were abandoned. More ambushes followed involving Mozambican vehicles, and a loosely guarded convoy system was reintroduced with militia and Freimo soldiers as escort.

According to transport sources, the organisation was sloppy and the Mozambicans were able to operate only two convoys each way a week, compared with the five or six run by the Zimbabwean army.

Last week’s ambush, which saw up to 45 people killed, most of them Freimo soldiers, has now put paid to any immediate hopes of increasing traffic. Indeed, according to the managing director of the Beira Corridor Group, David Zausner, the route is effectively closed.

Estimated

Most goods to and from Malawi will now have to go by road through Zambia, as the railway to Beira from Malawi is not operating and the rail route to the northern Mozambican port of Nacala can carry only limited traffic. The so-called express service takes up to eight days to make the journey to Nacala because of the poor condition of the track.

The road route through Zambia, known as the Chipata Corridor after the eastern Zambian town of Chipata means transporters have to go an additional 2,000 km on the round trip between Harare and Blantyre, making only one journey a week.

Vehicles go north from Harare, cross the Zambezi at Chirundu, go on to Lusaka, turn east across the Luangwa Valley through Petenke and Chipata into Malawi and then head south to Blantyre.

It has been estimated that 47 percent of Malawi’s foreign exchange earnings are spent on transportation. Now that bill will rise dramatically and will be increased further by the sharp rise in fuel prices in Zambia this month.

472 killed in Malawi floods

BLANTYRE - At least 472 people have died in flash floods in southeastern Malawi, rescuers said yesterday.

The flooding affected some 20,000 inhabitants of the Mulanje district 70km southeast of Blantyre and thousands were left homeless, regional administrator Stewart Wanga said.

Wanga, heading rescue operations, said the bodies of 472 flood victims were recovered by late Wednesday, the official Malawi News Agency reported.

Many of the victims evidently died in mudslides in the mountainous terrain. Large areas of vital crops were also destroyed following freak rain storms that began on Sunday, Wanga said.

Among the dead were an unspecified number of Mozambican refugees.

In recent years, more than 900,000 refugees have fled to Malawi to escape the bloody civil war in neighboring Mozambique.

The news agency on Wednesday reported that the government launched an appeal for food, tents and medical supplies for the flood victims.

Flood waters swept away bridges and roads, making access by rescuers difficult, the news agency said.

Brick dwellings as well as thousands of traditional mud-built huts were destroyed.

The flooding covered an area of about 3000sqkm close to the border with Mozambique.

BLANTYRE — More than 500 people have died in flash floods in Malawi's Mulanje district.

Thousands of people have been left without homes, food, water and electricity by the floods that poured down from Mount Mulanje and across the Phalombe plain.

The floods, on Sunday, swept over 494 square kilometres with a population of more than 21,000.

The full extent of the damage has not been assessed as rescue teams are still having difficulty entering some areas.

The Malawian government has appealed for international help for the victims and to repair bridges, roads and other infrastructure.

Swept away

Yesterday Malawi's President Hastings Banda flew over areas where scores of villages had been swept away and expressed sorrow.

"This is how nature is. It can be kind or it can be cruel," he told survivors.

The official Malawi News Agency said President Banda toured ruined buildings in the devastated settlements of Chirungu and Phalombe, 70 kilometres southeast of Blantyre.

The agency said several hundred people were missing and an estimated 150,000 people had been left homeless.

SA aids flood-stricken Malawi

By IVOR CREWS

A SOUTH AFRICAN disaster aid organisation has responded to an urgent SOS by the Malawi government to assist victims of flash floods which have devastated the country.

Tony Lean, chief executive of Cape Town-based Oasis International, said "We are sending one of our consultants to assess the damage and to establish how South Africa can help to provide emergency supplies." The organisation stepped in after reports that more than 500 people had died in the horror floods in Malawi's Malanje district, which have left 150,000 homeless and without food, water and electricity.

The Malawi government has appealed for international help, saying that food, tents and medical supplies are urgently needed.

HARARE — Army helicopters are taking food and essential supplies to survivors of the disastrous flashflood in southern Malawi that killed hundreds of people and has left thousands homeless.

The extent of the flood that wreaked havoc more than two weeks ago is only now becoming apparent.

A total of 472 people are feared dead and so far 120 bodies have been recovered, according to Red Cross Relief Co-ordinator John Undulu.

He said about R50 million was needed for relief and repair work.

At 6 am on March 10, a huge torrent of water poured down the slopes of the Micheast Hills at the foot of Mount Mulanje — engulfing villages, destroying bridges and roads and bringing boulders and tons of mud crashing on to the thatched homes of thousands of people living in the Phalombe Plains.

Mr Undulu, speaking after addressing the International Committee of the Red Cross which had been meeting in Harare, said 85,000 people had been affected by the disaster.

Nine large villages were destroyed in the flashflood and rain has continued to fall.

International relief agencies are assisting Malawi to identify immediate needs and the long-term assistance that will be required.

Apart from food and medical supplies, an essential immediate task is to reopen roads and to build temporary bridges to enable supplies to reach the people.
Malawi moves to SA

Closer links with SA's neighbours were forged this week when the Malawian-based Press Corporation made its first investment here.

The procurement and export company, to be based in Sandton, will be managed by the Boart International group, a subsidiary of Anglo American.

Press Corporation is a force in the Malawian economy, employing 16,000 people in agriculture, industry, distribution, property and finance.

The new company will meet the procurement needs of the Press Group, establish links with suppliers and identify and develop opportunities for trade between Malawi and SA.
The Malawian-based Press Corporation has made its first investment in SA with the formation of a procurement/export company in Sandton.

With an annual turnover of 700-million kwacha and 1990 pretax profits of 90-million kwacha, the Press Corporation is a major force in the Malawian economy. It employs 16,000 people in its agricultural, industrial, distribution, property and finance sectors.

The new company, Press Trading, has been formed to meet the procurement needs of Press Corporation more effectively, to establish closer 'direct links with suppliers and to identify and develop opportunities for SA trade', says Press Corporation CE Wyndham Freyer, who is also chairman of Press Trading.
SADF repairs roads, bridges in Malawi

By Ken Vernon

PHALOMBE — The South African Defence Force took a step in changing its “bad guy” image in Africa yesterday with the completion of a major aid project in Malawi area along the Mozambican border.

Handing the repaired bridges back at a ceremony here yesterday, South African Ambassador to Malawi Hugh Stroebel said “Operation Hacksaw” symbolised the commitment of the South African Government — and the SADF — to help in the development of southern Africa.

SADF Chief of Staff Logistics Major-General Deon Mortimer said the emergency aid project had represented a good opportunity for the SADF to get involved in similar operations in Africa.

“And we do want to get involved,” he said.

Operation Hacksaw cost almost R1 million and saw the involvement of up to 23 SADF personnel as well as the use of major construction equipment.

SADF helps ‘snake’ victims

BY KEN VERNON
SOWETAN AFRICA NEWS SERVICE

They say that the mother and father snake quarrelled before fleeing down the south-east side of the mountain.

The children fled down the northern slopes.

From the eagle-eye view from a Malawi Air Force helicopter, the appearance of the snake analogy becomes startlingly clear.

Destroy

Where the “mother and father” fled, two swathes of destruction 100m wide and 40m deep twist and turn through the remains of what used to be prosperous villages before spreading out to destroy thousands of acres of rich farmland.

The paths of the “children” are just as visible on the other side of the mountain.

It was one of these “children” that took away the son and father of Edward Matemba, as well as all of his possessions and most of his farming land.

“It happened so quickly that nothing could be done. The water came like a big wall and in a few minutes it was gone.”

“Now I don’t know what I can do, my wife and I have nothing left,” he says.

The flood waters also swept away 20 bridges that span the normally gentle streams flowing off Mt Michesi, effectively cutting off the area from relief operations except by helicopter.

In was in this situation that the South African Defence Force stepped in to assist.

According to South Africa’s ambassador to Malawi, Hugh Streebel, a chance remark at a diplomatic gathering led to the SADF intervention.

Disaster

Recounting the difficulties the tiny Malawi Defence Force was having coping with the disaster, Malawi Army Chief, General M. Khanga, asked SADF liaison office Col Nic Ackermann “what are you people going to do about it?”

Picking up on that remark the South African embassy quickly obtained Cabinet approval for a relief operation that included a Puma helicopter that quickly airlifted more than 50 tonnes of supplies into the area, as well as a team of engineers that had managed to temporarily open roads and clear washaways within three days.

“Operation Hack saw” as the relief effort came to be called, eventually repaired or rebuilt nine bridges and repaired kilometres of roads at a cost of almost R1m.

Unique

Quietly, without any publicity, the SADF has been involved in similar operations before but what made “Operation Hack saw” unique was that for the first time the SADF personnel worked openly in SADF uniforms, using SADF material and equipment far from South Africa’s borders.

Handing over the repaired bridges to Malawi this week, Streebel used a bridge metaphor to describe what he saw as South Africa’s new role in Africa - to build bridges between South Africans and Africans too long separated by chains of destruction.

“Building bridges is a symbol of what is happening inside South Africa as well as from South Africa by the South African government” he said.
BLANTYRE — Priests in this Malawian city are working overtime to perform funerals for victims of an AIDS epidemic which has reached such catastrophic proportions that it threatens the complete breakdown of the country's system of government and law and order.

One Blantyre priest said the church was expecting to carry out 40 to 50 funerals a day until the end of the century.

According to the latest figures published by the World Health Organisation, a staggering 37% of Malawi's population is infected with the AIDS virus — the highest incidence in any African country for which figures are available. More than 7,000 Malawians are already registered as having died of AIDS.

Nearly three-quarters of the army and police are HIV positive, a scenario Malawian officials fear could prompt the collapse of one of the most efficient defence forces in the region.

About 60% of mothers who deliver babies in urban areas are HIV positive. In the countryside, where education and health facilities are scarce, the percentage is likely to be even higher.

Equally seriously, AIDS is killing huge numbers of the country's leaders and administrators, from government officials to university professors and doctors.

"The key people in whom the country has invested time and money to be its future leaders are dying of AIDS. This will have an appalling impact on the development of Malawi over the next five years," says Jenny Borden, deputy director of Christian Aid, which carries out development work in Malawi through local groups.

The result could be the collapse of Malawi's efficient administration and a reversal of the advances in health and education, achieved under the 20-year rule of president for life, Hastings Banda, 94.

In the health sector, spending on AIDS victims is leading to the neglect of sufferers from other prevalent diseases like malaria and diarrhoea. Borden says Malawi's health system is already under pressure from the presence of more than a million Mozambican refugees.

Most hospitals cannot afford to treat AIDS victims. Although some have installed screening machines, they cannot afford other essentials like syringes, disinfectants and gloves.

At Nsanje district hospital in southern Malawi, half the patients suffer from AIDS-related diseases. Resources are so scarce that most patients have to lie on the floor.

With one nurse for every 100 patients, the AIDS victims are left to die as best they can. I saw one 10-year-old AIDS child dying slowly in her mother's arms on the concrete floor on a pile of rags. Desperately thin, the girl was too weak to move or speak.

Despite the prevalence of AIDS, stigma is still attached when a relative dies from the virus, says Tom Klaassen, a doctor at the hospital. "When patients die of AIDS, the relatives and the staff are usually reluctant to admit it, so the death is registered under other causes like tuberculosis. This makes it very difficult to collect accurate data."

Although the government has previously been reluctant, too, it has now launched a public awareness campaign. Billboards are posted on roadsides and condoms are distributed free at hospitals. Women wear "kanga" imprinted with warnings against AIDS, and AIDS songs are taught at nursery schools and health clinics.

Even Malawi's prostitutes, 90% of whom are believed to be HIV positive, are beginning to use condoms. One prostitute at a brothel in Blantyre, Malawi's largest city, said she insisted her clients use them.

But there are many in the country who cannot reach. There are no television sets in Malawi.

Many Malawian AIDS sufferers are migrant workers, and truck drivers who carry goods to and from SA.

One-party rule totters along in Malawi

LILONGWE — The lead story in Malawi's English-language daily was that His Excellency the Life President, Ngwazi D. H Kamuzu Banda, had attended a church service. The photograph accompanying this riveting item of news dated back to 1988.

Dr Hastings Banda, like Mrs Nancy Reagan, has a penchant for the Senate. Officially he is 85, unofficially, he is thought to be 93. Speculation on the subject is illegal even though, now that Dr Banda is obviously alive, no longer of great interest to Malawians. What was of interest on this occasion, however, was that Dr Banda, supposedly in church, was not even in Malawi.

Malawi's self-styled Ngwazi — conqueror or champion — has been on a private visit to England and Scotland for the past three weeks. It is an unusually long absence for one whose highly personalized regime has close parallels with the old regimes of Eastern Europe and has caused two main lines of speculation among Malawians: either that the old man is preparing for death by visiting the children he is rumoured to have fathered during his exile years in Britain, or that he is "visiting his money."

This is a reference to the widely held belief that much of his vast personal wealth has been invested in the country he so ferociously supports.

Idle speculation aside, Dr Banda's long absence has highlighted the fact that Malawi can, and does, run without him. That day-to-day government is now firmly in the hands of Official Hostess Cecilia.

BANDA MEETS MAJOR: President Hastings Banda of Malawi, right, with British Prime Minister John Major at 10 Downing Street this week.

Kadzamira, Dr Banda's "constant companion" for the past 30 years, and her uncle, official interpreter Mr John Tembo.

De facto he-apparent ever since the unlikely death of the country's last three de jure he-apparents, Mr Tembo is paving the way for the post-Banda days as one-party rule totters all around Malawi, a country that is living proof that repression can work.

In recent weeks, scores of political prisoners have been released from jail as Mr Tembo tries to curry favour both inside and outside Malawi — especially with the aid donors without whose help this land-locked country, burdened by poor harvests, transport problems and an ever-increasing army of Mozambican refugees, would be a terminal case.

Whither Malawi without Banda?

Is there life after Dr Banda? The question taxes most Malawians. As Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda, the country’s life president, staggers through his 90s, reports on his state of health have become a national obsession. And with good reason — for Dr Banda is Malawi.

One of the world’s great survivors, Dr Banda has made a good job of promoting the idea of his immortality. Dressed in a three-piece suit and Homburg hat, his trademark fly whisk in hand, the spry figure with twinkling eyes has been spotted in every corner of this impoverished country which he sees as his own vast personal estate.

Last year he reportedly suffered a stroke which took him out of circulation for several weeks. And a private visit which Dr Banda is currently paying to Britain is said to include a spell in a British hospital.

Since gaining independence from Britain in 1964, Malawi has known no other leader. In 1971 Dr Banda was made life president.

He is life president of the Malawi Congress Party, too. He is also prime minister and holds the defence, agriculture, justice and public works portfolios. Dr Banda’s blend of paternalistic capitalism and political conservatism has made him one of the West’s favourite dictators.

Unlike some of his neighbours, he also has a reputation for being honest and running a country which works. This has won Malawi crucial aid, enabling it to achieve impressive results in such areas as health and road-building.

But there is a darker side to Dr Banda’s rule. Those seen as a threat to his personality cult have been removed by a chillingly efficient security apparatus. The victims are sent to prisons such as Dzaleka, in central Malawi, where, in the words of Dr Banda himself in 1985, “they will rot, rot, rot” and special warders “will knock sense into their heads.” According to Amnesty International, hundreds of people have been imprisoned by Dr Banda. Few have been tried.

The most obvious successor is Mr John Tembo, a former finance minister and governor of the Reserve Bank. As uncle of the formidable Mama Cecilia Kadzamira, Dr Banda’s official hostess, Mr Tembo has unrivalled access to the president.

Ms Kadzamira is the person closest to Dr Banda and, as an astute politician in her own right, should not be ruled out as a possible successor.
Benign face of sinister regime

BLANTYRE — Is there life after Banda? The question taxes most Malawians. As Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda staggers through his 90s, reports on his state of health have become a national obsession. And with good reason — for Banda is Malawi.

One of the world's great survivors, Banda has made a good job of promoting the idea of his immortality.

Now old age is catching up with him. A private visit Banda is paying to Britain is said to include a spell in a British hospital.

Since gaining independence from Britain in 1964, Malawi has known no other leader. In 1971, Banda was made Life President. He also enjoys the semi-defined status of Ngwazi — a combination of savour and conqueror. Anyone who forgets to call him by his official titles does so at his cost — as prisoners languishing in Malawian jails have found out.

Banda is Life President of the Malawi Congress Party, too. He is Prime Minister and also holds various other Cabinet portfolios.

Banda's blend of paternalistic capitalism and political conservatism has made him one of the West's favourite dictators. Unlike some of his neighbours, he has a reputation for being honest and running a country which works.

But there is a darker side to Banda's rule. Those seen as a threat to his personality cult have been removed by a chillingly efficient security apparatus.

The victims are sent to prisons such as Dedza in central Malawi, where, in the words of Banda himself in 1985, "they will rot, rot, rot", and where special warders "will knock sense into their heads". According to Amnesty International, hundreds, possibly thousands, of people have been imprisoned by Banda. Few have been tried.

But change may be coming. Since the beginning of the year, 28 political prisoners have been released, possibly as a result of muddling from foreign governments and international agencies such as the World Bank.

Even the most experienced diplomats, however, are unwilling to bet on a successor. The most obvious successor is John Tembo, a former finance minister and Governor of the Reserve Bank.

As the uncle of the formidable Mama Cecilia Kacadzamira, a former nurse-receptionist now known as Banda's Official Hostess, Tembo has unrivalled access to the President.

Now must Kacadzamira herself — the person closest to Banda — be ruled out. Nor a military coup, or a takeover by exile groups, although none seems to be organised so far — Daily Telegraph over the years to stop supporting the Mozambican rebel movement, Renamo.

Banda, a dictatorial leader, was made life president in 1971, in addition to being prime minister and life president of the Malawian Congress Party. He never tolerated political opposition or adverse comment from foreign journalists and he severely curbed press freedom in Malawi.

Tembo is a former finance minister and is governor of the country's Reserve Bank. He has a reputation for ruthlessness and analysts believe Tembo would be even less tolerant of opposition and political freedoms than Banda.

Malawi's capacity to produce food — once considerable — has been badly affected by drought and recent floods have left 85,000 people homeless.

The country is further hampered by having the highest incidence of AIDS cases on the continent, according to figures that have been released by the World Health Organisation. Some 37% of the population is HIV-positive, which includes 75% of Malawi's goose-stepping police and defence forces.
Banda's death 'blatant lie'

By Esmé van der Merwe
Political Reporter

President Hastings Banda of Malawi is still alive — and that's official.

Responding to renewed rumours that the life-president had died, a ministry of external affairs spokesman said yesterday: "As far as we know, that is a blatant lie."

A report in a South African publication, quoting Western intelligence sources, claimed that the ageing dictator — Malawi's first and only president since independence in 1964 — had died this week on return from London where he had undergone medical treatment.

But Western diplomats said they saw President Banda, now believed to be in his 80s, in Malawi at the weekend.
Africans revamp to meet competition

WHILE SAA is staking a claim in the opening African travel market, African airlines are revamping and restyling in order not to be swamped by the giant from SA.

One airline offering more flights on its routes than SAA is Air Malawi, which is becoming important as a regional carrier.

The airline recently embarked on a major programme, upgrading its fleet, re-training staff and streamlining operations.

Business travellers appear to have taken cognisance of the changing nature of Air Malawi.

Business class bookings on the airline’s Boeing 737-300 flights — which offer 29 seats — have seen nearly 70% growth in the past month.

The airline has three return flights a week between Johannesburg and Lilongwe and offers connections to Harare, Nairobi, Lusaka and Blantyre.

A second Boeing 737-300 is to be added to the fleet at the end of next year, while new, more efficient and spacious turbo-prop aircraft are to be bought for the shorter flights.

The investment is believed to be worth about R200m.

Air Malawi GM Rev Lezard says the acquisition of a modern fleet and the decision to revamp the airline’s structure are part of a larger plan which will leave the airline positioned to aggressively compete for a larger share of the expanding southern African air travel market.

Demand for multiparty Malawi

Argus Africa News Service

LUSAKA. — A Malawian opposition group, the United Front for Multiparty Democracy (UFMD), has called on South African and Western countries to cut off financial and economic aid to Malawi unless President Kamuzu Banda introduces a multiparty system in their country.

The Zambian-based interim chairman of the UFMD, Mr. Akongo Kanyanya, said the front would soon lobby for support and aid from these countries so that they could exert pressure on President Banda.

The front wants all Malawian exiles to be granted amnesty, all prisoners to be released and an interim government to be formed in Malawi.
Thousands of railway workers marched and demonstrated countrywide yesterday in support of pay and other demands, said South African Railway and Harbour Workers Union general secretary Mr Martin Sebakwane.

Seventeen union members also started a sit-in demonstration in Spoornet's Cape Town offices yesterday, said Sarhwa Western Cape regional chairman Mr Otto Balfour.

People and groups with clout secure releases, writes Caroline Moorehead

Governments are sensitive to world pressure

Does international pressure secure the release of political prisoners? Human rights organisations are multiplying, and their reports become more authoritative, but how effective are they?

True, detainees are released after campaigns, but there is a suspicion that in parts of Latin America and Asia too much publicity was one reason why governments stopped holding political prisoners, who began “disappearing.”

Pressure is a delicate instrument. How far it works seems to depend on where it is done, by whom and what form it takes.

The freeing of Jack Mapanje, the Malawian poet, after 3½ years in prison gives a rare picture of how pressure can operate.

Mr Mapanje was the head of the Department of English Language and Literature at the University of Malawi and author of a collection of poems critical of the policies of President Hastings Banda. On September 25, 1987, he was arrested.

Mr Mapanje was neither charged nor tried. He was put into solitary confinement and for 20 months allowed neither visits from his wife and three children, nor from a priest. He is a practising Roman Catholic.

Most Malawians who have opposed President Banda’s regime, Mr Mapanje had long expected arrest.

However, he was not prepared for the horrors of the prison: no contact with the outside world, nothing to read, and little food. He became dizzy with malnutrition. Prisoners were stripped naked, put into leg irons cemented to the floor, doused with water and left for several days for minor offences.

But, unknown to Mr Mapanje, a campaign had been started on his behalf.

Later, he concluded that three factors had been particularly important.

One was a report on his case put out by the human rights group Africa Watch.

Another was a warning from the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the European Community that further funds might be put in jeopardy if Malawi did not tackle the question of abuses.

But Mr Mapanje believes that possibly the most important reason for his release was the way that so many high-ranking international figures petitioned President Banda on his behalf. — The Independent News Service
Malawi steps up anti-aids drive

AS concern over AIDS-related deaths increases in Malawi, new prevention projects are taking shape. Official figures, good only up to October 1990, estimate 12 000 cases.

Health Minister Dr. Hethelwick Ntaba says the figures are much higher: a year later Ntaba heads the National AIDS Committee (Nac). He says that with an infusion of foreign donor money various anti-Aids campaigns have been launched.

The European Community has pumped in nearly R2.8-million for information, education and communication activities aimed at preventing sexual transmission of the Human Immuno-deficiency Virus (HIV).

The target for such campaigns is high risk behaviour groups, like truck drivers, bar attendants and prostitutes.

The United States Agency for International Development (Usaid) has also chipped in about R1.27-million for a demographic and health survey to furnish planners and policy makers with up-to-date information on AIDS, fertility, mortality, malaria and child spacing knowledge and practice.

Although free condoms are issued at government hospitals, the health ministry has launched a new programme which seeks to increase their availability and use.

Called Health Social Marketing Project (HSMP), the project is selling condoms at a small fee to low income consumers. Says HSMP Co-ordinator Ndidza Mbuyundula: "We have so far distributed 178 000.000 condoms."

The condoms are distributed by Usaid and sold in packets of three at about 75 cents or 12 at about R1.84. They are distributed by the multinational Lever Brothers through its 6 000 wholesale and retail outlets throughout the country.

Recent research revealed that 84 percent of men knew that condoms are effective against AIDS.

Calls for Banda to stand down shrugged off

LILONGWE (Malawi) - The government defended its one-party system yesterday and denied calls by exiles for the immediate resignation of President Hastings Kamuzu Banda as "abundant and childish".

In a statement issued by the official Malawi News Agency, the government denied it had used secret police to crush opposition in this impoverished nation of 5 million people.

The statement said the government was answering remarks made in Zambia by Malawian exile Kanyama Chilume.

On Friday, Mr Chilume was quoted in newspapers calling for restoration of multiparty politics in Malawi in keeping with reforms that have shaken many African governments.

He accused the government of using Nazi-style Gestapo tactics against political dissenters and urged President Banda to hand over power to an all-party interim government while democratic elections are arranged.

Dr Banda, who is older than 90, led the former British colony of Nyasaland to independence in 1964.

He outlawed opposition parties in 1966 and declared himself president for life in 1971.

The government statement said opposition parties "died a natural death" after the first independence elections and that the majority of Malawians supported the one-party system because Dr Banda's Malawi Congress Party "has lived up to its promises and delivered the goods to the people".

In the past, some human rights groups have accused Dr Banda's government of jailing, torturing and assassinating opponents.

Ninety years on, Malawi braces for Banda's end

By GAVIN EVANS

MALAWI's exiled opposition parties are planning to unite in preparation for the death of the world's oldest head of state, Hastings Banda.

After over 27 years of absolute rule the 90-plus life president has shown no inclination to make even the limited concessions to democracy forced on Kenya's Daniel arap Moi. But with Banda's health rapidly and visibly failing, his opposition is preparing to make a non-violent bid for power.

Former Cambridge economist and United Nations official Dr George Mkali said his Malawian Democratic Party (launched last October) would be joining forces with the older, Canadian-based Malawi Party in Johannesburg in March. Both parties advocate multi-party democracy and the establishment of a democratic political framework.

Banda, however, clearly has other plans and is believed to be preparing to transfer power to his chief lieutenant, John Tembo—a view enhanced by his recent sacking of one of Tembo's most powerful opponents, cabinet and presidential secretary Justin Mwalwasi.

Interviewed in Johannesburg this week, Mkali said he was rallying support from the 150,000 South African-based Malawians, distributing pamphlets in Malawi and lobbying the international community, against Banda.

"I've had a positive response from the German and Canadian governments and have been in communication with the South African government. I have set up an office in the centre of Johannesburg and have had a very positive response from Malawian migrant workers, who help distribute our pamphlets when they return home."

Aside from a history of brutal suppression of any opposition to his rule, the major charge against Banda is that he has run the country's once-viable economy as a personal business empire. According to Mkali, 70 percent of all businesses in the country fall under the control of the Banda-owned Press Holdings and its subsidiaries. He also owns 72 farms and controls all typing.

The result has been the rapid deterioration of the economy, with serious shortages being experienced in most primary foodstuffs. This situation has been made worse by the decline in transport and health services. "Banda is a tyrant who has eliminated his opponents through detention and death squads," Mkali said.
Malawi Tackles Deforestation

A new wind in the battle against deforestation has been initiated in Malawi. The government has set up a task force consisting of members from various departments including forestry, wildlife, and fisheries. This team is working towards a comprehensive plan to combat the widespread problem of illegal charcoal production.

Deforestation is a major issue in Malawi, with the country's forests facing severe degradation. The task force has identified illegal charcoal production as a significant contributor to this problem. Forest guards have been equipped with tools to combat these activities, and they are working closely with local communities to educate them about the negative impacts of deforestation.

But Malawi, with its responsibility to look after fisheries, forestry and wildlife in the 10-member SADC grouping, has not yet lost the war on deforestation. Armed with a lot of cash and new ideas, the government has come up with answers to try to reverse the situation.

Firstly, with the support of the United Nations' Development Programme (UNDP), it launched an emergency fuel wood supplies project to Mozambican refugees and some 3,000 Malawians living near camps in Dedza.

"The programme is aimed at preserving trees," said former UNDP resident Dr. K. Matteer when she launched the project.

Under the same project, a total of 18,700 stove kits will be provided to refugee families in this district. The stove, locally made, uses 60 to 80 percent less wood or charcoal than regular cooking stoves, claim the manufacturers. If 20,000 stoves were used, they could save more than 60,000 tonnes of wood a year.

Malawi undertook a tree-planting programme in 1980.

Okay to be a Muslim in Malawi

By Felix Mpondla Blantyre

It's no longer a shame to be a Muslim in Malawi," says Muslim Association of Malawi executive secretary, Mr Ibrahim Milanzi. Milanzi is one of a young breed of Muslims in this Christian-dominated country fighting to maintain the dignity and image of the Islamic faith after many decades of it being regarded as a shameful and backward religion.

In the past, Muslims were called "anasi"a derogatory term meaning backwardness in every aspect of life.

Today, there has been a marked turn-around in attitudes towards Muslims.

Concedes Malawi's Muslim leader, Sheikh Hussein Msalaba: "Muslims have now gained a respectable place because there are educated Muslims in almost every field, unlike in the past when lack of education hundered them from participating in national development."

Islam was the first religion to blaze a trail of conquest in this country. It arrived with the Arabs during the ivory and slave trade era.

"Islam wasn't well-developed till recently," Milanzi said.

He believes Christianity, which came to Malawi much later, overtook Islam in popularity because "Christianity came well-developed, what with trade and education systems."

"Islam continued to be a secret religion and few people knew about its teachings and practices."

It was not until the forties that Muslims came together to form an organisation of their own aimed at safeguarding the interests of the religion.

In 1957 the faith was officially registered with the colonial government.

But with no educational facilities of their own, Muslims still remained uneducated.

Parents found it difficult to send their children to Christian-controlled schools for fear that their children would be converted to Christianity — a requirement at that time.

With independence in 1964, the government started encouraging Muslim parents to send their children to any school, with the agreement that they would not be forced to convert.

A magnificent mosque, believed to be the only one of such grandeur in the Southern African region, and which cost close to a million kwacha, is a showpiece of architectural design in Blantyre's "Asian city" of Limbe.

More modern mosques have mushroomed throughout the country, underlining the fact that Islam is thriving. According to Milanzi, there are now 80 new mosques.

A secondary school offering Islamic and secular education and catering exclusively for Muslim students with expatriate teachers from Sudan, India, Egypt and Somalia, opened its doors a few years ago.

Those who excel here went abroad for professional courses in medicine and engineering.

Under the sponsorship of the Islamic Development Bank, there are now 15 Malawian Muslims studying in Pakistan and Turkey in the two fields, with the first two graduates expected home later this year.

Milanzi, who has been executive secretary of the Muslim Association for the past five years, believes "image cultivating" developments are behind the conversion of Muslims to other religions in the past. The opposite, he added, is happening now that more people are currently joining Islam than leaving it.

There has never been any census of Muslims in Malawi, but Milanzi estimates there are about two million followers in this nation of eight million people.

"The attraction with Islam is that it is strong on monotheism (the worship of one God), like Judaism and Christianity," Milanzi said.

"Our approach to our religion is different from others. There is a strong spirit of brotherhood and uniformity of prayers all over the world."

"Islam as a religion has really grown big and is being respected in that we are treated as a non-governmental organisation which can contribute to national development."

Amnesty: Malawian prisoners tortured

LONDON — Amnesty International said yesterday that prisoners in some Malawian jails were beaten, chained, kept naked and starved so that many of them died.

The human rights group called on the Malawian government to end the “hard core” prison centres. “Not only is torture and ill-treatment routine but the government is allowing prison authorities to act with impunity,” the report said.

The Malawian High Commission in London yesterday dismissed the allegations as “gross misrepresentation and fabrication.”
Crocodiles lick lips as Banda wields big stick

HASTINGS  Kamuzu Banda, President For Life of Malawi and the only African leader to make no concessions to the continent-wide demands for democracy and human rights, made a rare reference to political opposition in his country last week.

He said that if exiled dissidents returned to Malawi, they would be "meat for crocodiles".

One of the last two men in Anglophone Africa to have ruled their countries since independence, President Banda is now believed to be well into his 90s. Yet in a recent Cabinet reshuffle he awarded himself the posts of Minister of Agriculture, External Affairs, Works, and Women, Children and Community Services.

In a small concession to the tide of multiparty democracy which has swept away many of his fellow presidents in the past 18 months, President Banda has called on Malawians to discuss the issue of the one-party state.

Parliamentary elections scheduled for May, however, will be held firmly within the one-party rule of the Malawi Congress Party.

His reference to the crocodiles suggests he is not about to enter into a dialogue with the exited opposition movement, the United Front for Multiparty Democracy in Malawi (UFDM).

Nor is he showing any sign of improving respect for human rights in Malawi. Last year Britain halved its aid to Malawi because of its human rights record and two weeks ago Lynda Chalker, the British Minister for Overseas Aid, repeated the hope that political prisoners in Malawi would be released.

A few years ago, when Margaret Thatcher visited Malawi, she spoke of the country as one of Britain's closest allies and praised Dr Banda for his leadership and wisdom, but no mention was made of human rights.

A report by Amnesty International published on Friday, however, says many people in prison in Malawi have died from ill-treatment or medical neglect. The human rights organisation cited four cases of political detainees dying in prison since 1986 and is calling on President Banda to allow regular, independent access to Malawian prisons to ensure that they conform to international standards.

The report says torture and ill-treatment are routine and that persistent criminal offenders are subjected to a "hard-core programme" at Dzaleka and Nsanje prisons, where they are forced to run the gauntlet of warders who beat them with clubs, whips and iron bars when they arrive. Those who survive are chained naked to the floors of their cells and fed one-quarter rations of food, it says.

Among those subjected to special treatment is Orton Chirwa, the former political opposition leader, now 73.

The UFDM, now based in Lusaka, has called for a multiparty system in Malawi and is threatening disruptive action if Dr Banda does not end the one-party state.

Bishops accuse Malawi of abuses

LUSAKA - Churches in Malawi have joined the Zambian-based United Front for Multiparty Democracy in Malawi calling for more freedom and condemnation of the government for growing corruption, bribery and injustice.

In a pastoral message released last Sunday and made available in Lusaka yesterday, seven Roman Catholic bishops expressed stern reservations on several basic human rights issues.

"Many people still live in circumstances which hardly compatible with their dignity as sons and daughters of God. Their life is a struggle of survival. "At the same time, the minority enjoy the fruits of development and can afford to live in luxury and wealth. We appeal for a more just and equal distribution of the nation's wealth."

The bishops accused the government of Dr Kamuzu Banda of grossly violating human rights with - Sapa.
Banda puts screws on Catholic Church

LONDON — Malawi's eight Catholic bishops were interrogated for eight hours yesterday about a pastoral letter read in churches last weekend which criticized the government of President Hastings Banda.

This is the first time that any criticism of the 28-year rule of the life president has been heard in public.

The letter, Living Our Faith, which was read in 30 churches, is estimated to have been heard by a quarter of the population.

The bishops said "Academic freedom is seriously restricted, exposing injustices can be considered a betrayal, revealing some evils of our society is seen as slandering the country, monopoly of mass media and censorship prevent the expression of dissenting views."

The six African and two European bishops have been ordered to meet the president within the next two days and have been confined to Blantyre until then.

President Banda's grip on the country is being weakened because of age — he is thought to be over 90 — and because his allies such as Britain, converted to the new doctrine of democracy for Africa, are deserting him.

Parliamentary elections scheduled for May, however, will be held firmly within the one-party rule of the Malawi Congress Party. His reference to the crocodiles suggests he is not about to enter into a dialogue with the exiled opposition movement, the United Front for Multi-Party Democracy in Malawi.

Nor is he showing any sign of improving respect for human rights in Malawi. Last year Britain halved its aid to Malawi because of human rights record and Lynda Chalker, the British Minister for Overseas Aid, recently repented the hope that political prisoners there would be released.

A few years ago, when the former British Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, visited Malawi, she spoke of the country as one of Britain's closest allies and praised Mr. Banda for his leadership and wisdom. No mention was made of human rights.

A report by Amnesty International, however, says many people in prison in Malawi have died from ill-treatment or medical neglect. The human rights organisation cited four cases of political detainees dying in prison since 1990 and is calling on President Banda to allow regular, independent access to Malawian prisons to ensure they conform to international standards.

The report says torture and ill-treatment are routine and persistent. Criminal offenders are subjected to a "hard core programme" at Zaleka and Nsanje prisons, where "they are forced to run the gauntlet of warders who beat them with clubs, whips and iron bars when they arrive. "Those who survive are chained naked to the floors of their cells and fed one-quarter rations of food," the report says.

Among those subjected to special treatment is Ortón Chirwa, the former political opposition leader, now 73 years old, who was kidnapped by Malawian security forces in 1983 and has been in prison ever since. In May last year, according to the Amnesty report, he was put in leg-irons, handcuffed and made to squat with an iron bar between his knees for two days.

The UPMD, now based in the Zambian capital, Lusaka, has called for a multi-party system in Malawi and is threatening disruptive action if Mr. Banda does not end the one-party state — The Independent News Service, London.
Malawi unbending on reform demand

THE Malawi government, one of the last to withstand the wave of democratic reforms sweeping Africa, remains intransigent in the face of pressure for reform.

But the pressure is growing rather than abating and the aged President Kamuzu Banda is looking increasingly embattled.

The University of Malawi in Zomba was closed this week after student protests that followed the brief detention and interrogation of eight Roman Catholic bishops for criticising the government.

The bishops were reported to have gone into hiding. At the same time there were signs of a hardening of attitudes among European governments to Banda.

Banda's recent troubles were sparked by the release on March 7 of an Amnesty International report detailing a pattern of arbitrary arrests, torture and punishment in the country's prisons for hard core political prisoners.

The report described the harsh treatment meted out to the 72-year-old prisoner of conscience, Mr. Orton Chirwa, who was kidnapped by Malawian government agents some years ago from Zambia, where he had been conducting a campaign of opposition to the autocratic government of President Kamuzu Banda.

It told how in May last year Chirwa was subjected to "cell punishment", which meant that he was made to squat with an iron bar behind his knees for two days, while pinned down by handcuffs and leg irons. Dissidents have rarely dared to return home. In Malawi even a moving car is not considered a safe place to speak out.

The exiled opposition coalition, the United Front for Multiparty Democracy in Zambia, declared that "the statement by the bishops reflects an accurate picture of the state of Malawi".

The release of a similar Amnesty report in 1989, and an uncompromising reaction from Banda's government, had led to the temporary withdrawal of aid by the international community.

In a subsequent burst of liberalism the government released a number of political prisoners.

This time, however, it seemed that the government was not inclined to bow to Western pressure.

It categorically denied all allegations of arbitrary arrests, intimidation and failed polices, and then detained the eight bishops who had signed the letter.

They were held for questioning in a Blantyre police station for eight hours.

After being released, the bishops, apparently abandoning their previous belief that publicity would keep them safe, said that they could not speak publicly about what had happened.

The police requested anyone with a copy of the letter to return it to their nearest police station or face arrest. Amid reports that threats had been against their lives, the bishops disappeared from public view — but received support from the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, of which the President is a member and which is one of the strongest in Malawi.

The government's hardline attitude in the face of international and internal criticism comes at a time when it can little afford it.

Malawi relies very heavily on foreign aid for its survival and development, not least because of the 1 million Mozambican refugees living in the overpopulated country.

On top of the stirrings of political opposition, the rains have failed again, raising the spectre of food shortages. New figures reveal that Malawians are far worse off than the government has ever admitted.

Seventy percent do not grow enough food to sustain themselves in any 12-month period, and 55 percent of the population suffers stunted growth as the result of malnutrition.

In the past, Malawi has received large amounts of foreign aid largely because, like Kenya, its capitalist policies and its prompt repayment of debts have won favour in the West.

But attitudes have changed as Western donors have pegged continued aid to good governance and respect for human rights. Kenya's President Daniel arap Moi recently bemoaned the West's "unfriendliness", saying "we are bitter, because they abandoned us when it came to the question of democracy."

Banda, now almost 94, and part of the British establishment as an official of the Church of Scotland, may not want to accept that his friends will abandon him too. But they already appear to have begun to do so, as was shown last year when Britain witheld half of its balance of payment support.
Winds of opposition blow in Malawi

MALAWI, one of Africa's most closed societies, has been shaken by an unprecedented flurry of political activity over the past two weeks.

It was sparked by the release of a Catholic bishops' pastoral letter criticising the government of President Kamuzu Banda on March 8.

This was followed by student protests, the closing of the university, the burning down of the press that printed the letter, and a meeting of Malawian opposition forces in Lusaka.

Delegates to the Lusaka meeting are calling for multi-party democracy in a country under the iron one-party rule of Banda and his Malawi Congress Party since independence from Britain in 1964.
Food crisis for refugees

MAPUTO — Nearly 1 million Mozambican refugees face starvation in neighbouring Malawi because of the southern African drought, say UN officials. The available food for the refugees is expected to be exhausted by July 1995, says a document presented by the office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) at a crisis meeting in Maputo last week.

The UNHCR said there were 860,000 Mozambican refugees in Malawi, and warned delegates there was no food aid in the pipeline for them. No pledges had been made. The workshop on large-scale repatriation of Mozambican refugees was attended by UNHCR officials, the Mozambican government and neighbouring states.

Malawi hosts by far the biggest number of refugees who have fled the 16-year war between the Frelimo government and Renamo rebels. Another 500,000 are in S. Africa, Tanzania and Zaire, UN reports say. — Reuters
Malawians ‘protest call for reform’

HARARE. Thousands of people have demonstrated across Malawi, condemning the country’s Roman Catholic bishops for criticising Malawi’s human rights record and calling for democratic reform, the official Malawi News Agency (MANA) reported yesterday.

It said demonstrators took to the streets on Tuesday in seven towns, including the capital Lilongwe and the commercial centre Blantyre, to “show their solidarity with Malawi Life President Kamuzu Banda, the party and the government”.

Malawi, which has a population of 8.5 million, has been tightly ruled by President Banda, 93, since independence from Britain in 1964. He outlawed all opposition parties shortly after taking power.

Malawi’s Catholic bishops issued a pastoral letter on March 8 calling on the government to respect basic human rights and to allow multi-party politics.

The government denounced the bishops for meddling in politics but denied reports that they had been arrested and interrogated.

Malawian exiles and critics of President Banda’s government added a four-day meeting in Zambia on Monday, setting up a committee to lead a campaign — for multi-party democracy in their homeland.

Malawian exiles warn Banda of trouble

By MOKGADI PELA

MALAWIAN president Kamuzu Banda's 26-year-old "unpaid dictatorship" is facing mounting opposition - this time from the Malawi Democratic Party which issued him a two-week ultimatum to introduce multi-party democracy or face the consequences.

Representatives of the MDP, who are in self-imposed exile in South Africa, have threatened 81-year-old Banda with civil disobedience if he fails to introduce multi-party democracy within that time.

The leaders, who described themselves as "a new generation of blacks", said they were determined to overthrow Africa's most famous bachelor.

MDP secretary general Sampala Cheyo Nyondo said Banda would be forced like his counterparts in Ethiopia and Zambia who failed to read the signs of history.

But Nyondo said they would use peaceful means to unseat Banda and his Malawi Congress Party.

Nyondo said Banda had "imprisoned, killed and gagged" many of his opponents.

Malawi's media was not even allowed to report on coups in several parts of Africa lest the winds of change reached his country, according to the MDP.

"Zambia's Kenneth Kaunda and Ethiopia's Mengstu Haile Mariam are now bitter men because they tried to cling onto power for decades," Nyondo said.

"Look at the economies of Zambia and Ethiopia. They are ruined by that first generation of African leaders."

Two weeks ago, the University of Malawi was closed after student protests that followed the brutal detention and interrogation of eight Roman Catholic bishops for criticising the government.

The bishops were reported to have gone into hiding. At the same time, there were signs of a hardening of attitudes among European governments to Banda.

Banda's recent troubles were sparked by the release on March 7 of an Amnesty International report detailing a pattern of arbitrary arrests, torture and punishment cells in the country's prisons for hard core political prisoners.
Scribes' letter to Banda

A conference of Southern African journalists has sent a letter of protest to Malawi's leader Dr Kamuzu Banda over the continued detention without trial of a journalist.

The conference, convened by the Bantu Journalists Association (Bjoa) and held over five days in Gaborone last week, said in the letter that the detention of freelance writer Mr Simon Mhone since December last year had caused great concern.

"Mhone's detention without trial since December 1993 is an infringement of internationally recognized rights of journalists to freely exercise their duties," the letter said.

The conference called on Banda to release Mhone without further delay. The conference was told that Mhone was a freelance journalist who was detained after filing a story for an international news agency.

Approved

The story had been approved by government censors beforehand, it was said.

It was also disclosed that in the first six months of 1994, 15 journalists had been killed in South Africa.

The conference, which included journalists from Namibia, Zimbabwe, South Africa, Zambia, and Uganda, also expressed concern about the harassment of journalists who were accused of "exaggerating" inter-tribal fights between the Kalanga and Lozi and Kachena in the north.

Beza chairman Mr Mpho Mfutsa said after the conference that a protest note would also be sent to Kenya.

"As African journalists we are tired of looking on as our colleagues are brutalized by dictators. We are going to speak out against such abuses wherever they occur and will continue to support each other," he said.
Exile plans to 'oust' Banda

JOHANNESBURG. — An exiled Malawian dissident plans a showdown today with Malawi's President Hastings Kamuzu Banda — 32 years after their first meeting — on restoring human rights and democracy.

Mr Chakuwwa Chihana, 52, said here yesterday he intended to fly to Malawi this morning to launch a nationwide movement to oust Dr Banda.

Colleagues have told him an arrest warrant and almost certain detention await him, said the labour leader who reportedly has been assaulted, jailed and exiled for his political activities.

Mr Chihana's planned return follows last month's pastoral letter issued by Malawian Catholic church leaders that sharply criticised Malawi's human rights record. The government called the letter "sedulous" and detained eight bishops overnight.

Mr Chihana said that he and his colleagues believed "now is the time to move".

Mr Chihana and others helped form the Malawi Congress Party in 1959 during increased opposition to British rule. The party won elections in 1961 and with Dr Banda as its leader, assumed power in 1963 prior to independence in 1964.

"If I am assassinated tomorrow, my blood will fuel and oil the engine of democracy," Mr Chihana said. — Sapa-AP
Malawian labour leader arrested

LILONGWE – A prominent Malawian dissident was arrested yesterday, minutes after he returned home from Johannesburg for a showdown with the authoritarian government of President Hastings Banda.

Labour leader Chakufwa Chihana, 52, was bundled into a waiting car by security agents after he attempted to read from a prepared text on thearmac at Lilongwe Airport, witnesses said.

Chihana left the plane waving a text calling for the ousting of Life President Kamuzu Banda, a return to democracy and respect for human rights, witnesses said.

There was no immediate comment from the government.

A Western diplomat, who was at the airport, said Western embassies intended to protest against the government’s action. Passengers on the flight from Johannesburg said Chihana expected to be jailed upon his return and “counted down” his last hours of freedom as the flight approached the capital, Lilongwe.

In Johannesburg Chihana’s colleagues in the National Democratic Alliance called for an immediate suspension of Western aid to Malawi as a response to his arrest.

Chihana, secretary-general of the powerful Lilongwe-based Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Council, attended a meeting in Zambia last month of Malawian dissidents who pledged to organise a democracy conference in their homeland in defiance of laws banning such gatherings.

On Sunday, Chihana accused Banda of leading one of Africa’s most repressive regimes. He predicted his return would mark a turning point in the quest for democratic reform in Malawi.

Calls for democracy have intensified since Roman Catholic bishops demanded reforms in a pastoral letter circulate early in March. The government declared the letter a “seditious document” – Sapa-AP.

Parks hoard

B7m in ivory

THE National Parks Board has an ivory stockpile worth B7m, but it will not sell it in violation of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (Cites) ban, says chief executive director Robbie Robinson.

Robinson says the parks have a population of 7 500 elephants and cull between 700 and 900 a year.

“We have R7m of ivory in our stockpiles and can produce R3m a year.”

Although we believe in the sustainable utilisation of wildlife, we will not be going against the decision of Cites – Sapa-AP.

SA will wait until debate has sorted out the issue.

Delegates at a meeting of Cites in Japan last month refused to lift the ban on ivory trade, sparking a defiant reaction from Zimbabwe, which said it would set up an ivory marketing centre in Gabon with Botswana, Namibia and Malawi.

Robinson would not comment on Zimbabwe’s plans.

LILONGWE - A prominent Malawian dissident was arrested yesterday, minutes after he returned home for a showdown with the authoritarian government of President Hastings Banda.

Labour leader Chakufwa Chihana (52) was bundled into a waiting car by security agents after he attempted to read from a prepared text on the tarmac at Lilongwe airport, eyewitnesses said.

Two agents pinnioned Chihana by the arms and pushed him into the back of the car, said the witnesses, who declined to be named.

It sped away to an undisclosed destination, escorted by four police cars and motorcycle outriders, they said.

Chihana descended from a flight from Johannesburg. South Africa, waving a text calling for the ousting of President Banda, a reaffirmation of the country's commitment to democracy and respect for human rights.

He was arrested on a flight from Johannesburg and was expected to be detained for five days and then flown to Lilongwe, the capital.

Chihana, who was not immediately reached for comment, was presumed to have been flown to Lilongwe.

The government had previously warned that anyone who attempted to fly from Zimbabwe to Malawi would be arrested.

He predicted his return would mark a turning point in the quest for democratic reform in Malawi.

Banda, aged in his 90s, has ruled the former British colony since independence in 1964.

He outlawed opposition parties and declared himself president in 1971.

Since then, Banda's opponents have been detained without trial and tortured and killed in mysterious circumstances. Human rights organizations have charged that the 1970s, Chihana and himself spent almost seven years in detention.

Calls for democracy have intensified in the southern African nation since Roman Catholic bishops demanded reforms in a pastoral letter circulated early in March.

Dissident arrested at airport

Malawian dissident Chafukwa Chihana flew back to his country from South Africa yesterday and was arrested when he landed at Lilongwe International Airport, a British Embassy spokesman confirmed.

"He appeared to be arrested at the foot of the ramp. He was then whisked away at high speed in a police car," said the spokesman, who declined to be named.

"We have reported back to London and are waiting for directives," Mr Chihana, assigned by a meeting of Malawian dissidents to spearhead a campaign for democracy, had vowed to return yesterday despite any consequences.

Diplomats had warned him there was a warrant for his arrest after he attended a meeting in Lusaka a few weeks ago.

The meeting followed unprecedented unrest in Malawi after six local Catholic bishops and two clerics wrote a pastoral letter exposing corruption and oppression.

The letter triggered protests at the university and clashes between police and students. Authorities closed the university in a bid to quell the unrest.

Five labour officials arrested in Malawi

LILONGWE — Malawi police arrested five labour officials who work with a prominent pro-democracy activist already in detention, Western diplomats said yesterday.

Supa-AP reports that the five, employed by the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Council, were believed to include nationals of neighbouring countries.

Diplomats said the five were arrested late on Monday, only hours after police detained leading dissident, Chakufwa Chihana, secretary-general of the council, a regional body representing about 10 million workers in a dozen southern African nations.

Chihana was arrested on the airport tarmac as he returned home for a showdown over human rights with the authoritarian government of President Hastings Banda. Police removed files from the labour office and drove off with the five officials after warning foreign diplomats at gunpoint not to intervene.

On Monday, the US embassy in Lilongwe protested the arrest of Chihana, 52, who returned from a month in neighbouring Zambia and SA.

In Zambia, opponents of Banda set up an interim committee to fight for democratic reform in Malawi. Chihana vowed to organise a national conference on democracy on his return home.

Political opposition is illegal in Malawi, where Banda has ruled since leading the former British colony to independence in 1964.

Crocodiles

Human rights organisations have accused him of detaining and killing opponents.

LINDEN BIRNS reports that Chihana said before leaving Jan Smuts Airport that Banda had promised to "feed me to the crocodiles" if he returned to Malawi.

A Malawi embassy spokesman in Pretoria, Percy Kachapande, was unable to say under what, if any, charges Chihana and the other officials had been arrested. The Malawi government was unaware, he said, that Chihana and a group of colleagues from the trade union council had been in SA to canvass support.

Ironically, Chihana's delegation left Johannesburg for Lilongwe on the same flight as the Malawian ambassador to SA. Before boarding, council member Ahmed Daeu said Chihana would call for the immediate installation of a multiparty democratic system in Malawi.

Chihana said he had prepared a speech which he would make soon after arriving in Lilongwe, but was arrested the moment he landed.

Chihana and Daeu were recently released from prison after being held for 18 months and eight years respectively without being charged.
Chihana’s plight poses challenge to SA foreign policy

As we emerge from the dark hole of apartheid, it is time to start thinking not only of the shape of our own nation but also about our relationships with others – particularly in this region where we shall be the dominant power.

What will be the criteria for our new foreign policy? For the past half century, our foreign policy has been that of the cornered rat – hissing and scratching and grabbing indiscriminately at any opportunity that came our way.

Our ethics as a nation were moulded by necessity rather than discernment. We fell in with other cutout nations, the sleazebags of the arms bazaar and shifty middle-men of the international underworld who helped us evade sanctions. The relationships we have done much to corrupt our standards of public morality. Now we have an opportunity to change all that.

An early challenge came our way last weekend when a Malawian dissident leader, Cuthbert Chihana, called here seeking support for his democratic cause in a country whose potential influence happens to be considerable.

Hardly anyone took any notice of him: he received more publicity in the European and American media than in our own.

Mr Chihana is an extraordinarily courageous man. He fell out with life president Hastings Kamuzu Banda 32 years ago when he was only 20, which led to his being banished to a remote region where youth leaguers assaulted him and left him for dead with an axe-blade in his head.

Catholic priests rescued him, nursed him back to health and smuggled him into exile, where he remained for 11 years until his involvement in a trade union strike call in Kenya led to his being deported back to Malawi.

Seven years of imprisonment without trial followed, during which Mr Chihana’s gross mal-treatment gained him the status of an Amnesty International prisoner of conscience. He spent five years in solitary confinement, where he was often chained to the floor, hung upside down, doused in water and beaten.

He says he saw many prisoners executed without trial.

Despite that experience, Mr Chihana, now 52, voluntarily flew back to Malawi, and renewed arrest, on Monday in order to highlight the lack of freedom in his country and hopefully galvanise the Western democracies and South Africa into action.

“I am aware that a warrant has been issued for my arrest and that immediately I step off the plane I shall be locked up. Some have warned I may be killed,” Mr Chihana said in Johannesburg before boarding the plane. “I admit I am apprehensive, but whatever happens my arrest or death can only fuel the struggle for democracy and basic human rights in Malawi.”

Two hours later, Western diplomats in Lilongwe confirmed that Mr Chihana had indeed been arrested on landing. Four colleagues were arrested as well.

The point is, Mr Chihana came to South Africa looking for help to liberate his country from the grip of a dictatorship. He came here because he knows we have potential influence on the situation there.

South Africa has befriended Malawi because the maverick Dr Banda, alone among African leaders, was prepared to recognise South Africa and establish diplomatic relations with us during the dark years of apartheid. As a result, we gave significant aid to Malawi.

It would obviously be churlish to repay Dr Banda’s friendship by turning nasty on him. But at the same time we are becoming another country and the new South Africa has new requirements and must have new standards.

It is the people of Malawi who should be concerned about, and it would not be incompatible with our relationship to use our influence not only to ensure Mr Chihana’s safety but to encourage Dr Banda to follow our example and democratise his country.

Malawi has been extraordinarily fortunate in escaping international criticism. Westerners have been so obsessed with their ideological conflict with communism that they have tended to overlook the fact that it is not only Marxist-Leninist regimes that are authoritarian.

But there has not been a meaning-ful election in Malawi since 1961. Five years later, Banda declared the country a one-party state, and in 1971 made himself life president. He appoints all MPs, all executive members of the party, all mayors, councilors, even tribal chiefs. There is no opposition, no free press, no free public debate.

To criticise the Government is to commit treason.

Now at the age of 94 Banda is surrounded by a strange entourage intent on perpetuating the system after he is gone. They include Mama Cecilia Kadzamira, Banda’s one-time nurse who is Malawi’s “Official Hostess”, and her uncle, John Tembo, a strong man in line to take over.

But there are new winds of change blowing down Africa. The elections last October that swept Kenneth Kaunda from power in neighbouring Zambia stirred an awakening in Malawi. Last month the Catholic bishops of Malawi issued a pastoral letter, sharply criticising the government for its human rights violations.

Malawi receives cold shoulder over arrest

A courageous Malawian who has suffered 32 years of extraordinary persecution returned this week to renewed detention. His reason? To galvanize Western democracies into taking action. ANDREW MELDRUM reports

He is a founder member of Banda's Malawi Congress Party, but at the age of 20 he fell out with Banda and was banished to a remote area in northern Malawi, where he was attacked by members of Banda's Youth League and left for dead with an axe blade in his head.

With the help of Catholic priests, who nursed him back to health, he managed to escape to Kenya. He remained in exile for 11 years, until his involvement in a trade union strike called angered the Kenyan government and he was deported back to Malawi.

He was detained without trial for seven years, five of which were spent in solitary confinement. The beatings, torture and maltreatment he was subjected to during his detention gained him the status of an Amnesty International prisoner of conscience.

After his release, Chihana continued with trade union work and became general secretary of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Council.

On the way to a meeting of exiled Malawian dissidents held in Lusaka last month, Chihana was detained and interrogated. When he eventually made it to Lusaka, he was chosen to head an interim committee which aims to convene a national conference to plan a democratic future for the country.

While he was in Lusaka, Chihana publicly identified himself with a letter issued by the Catholic bishops of Malawi which sharply criticised the government for its human-rights violations. And in an interview with the BBC, he described Banda's Congress Party as "a party of darkness and death" — effectively guaranteeing his arrest when he returned home.

There is the possibility that the Banda regime may molder on — like its aging leader, who is now 94 — until his death. But even if it is able to ride out the present storm, Chihana's actions and the publicity surrounding the Catholic bishops' criticism has made it virtually certain that Banda's heirs apparent — Minister of State John Tembo and Official Hostess Cecilia Kadzimira — will not be able to maintain the regime after Banda's demise.

Chihana's arrest, despite the fact that he faced certain arrest, was well timed. The regional drought has exacerbated Malawi's need for international aid to feed its population of 8.2 million as well as an estimated 1.2 million refugees from Mozambique. Scandinavian aid donors have already applied pressure to secure the release of political prisoners and a firm insistence on democratic reform from other international donors may well bear fruit.

Chihana's arrest certainly achieved his purpose of highlighting the lack of political freedom in his country. Before he boarded his plane from Johannesberg last weekend, he said he hoped to galvanise the Western democracies and South Africa into action.

"I am aware that a warrant has been issued for my arrest and that immediately I step off the plane I shall be locked up. Some have warned I may be killed. I admit I am apprehensive, but whatever happens my arrest or death can only fuel the struggle for democracy and basic human rights in Malawi," he said.

Chihana (52) is a veteran opponent of Banda's regime and during the past 32 years he has suffered extraordinary persecution as a result.

In May 1984, he was sentenced to 69 years in prison on charges of treason and sedition, after he publicly criticised the government's failure to address the drought. He was convicted of treason and sedition in absentia and sentenced to 69 years in prison, but the sentence was later reduced to 32 years.

Despite being sentenced to 32 years in prison, Chihana managed to escape and went into hiding in Kenya. He remained in exile for 11 years, until he was arrested in 1993 and sentenced to 50 years in prison.

In 1995, he was released on bail and was allowed to return to Malawi to continue his work in the trade union movement. He has been a vocal critic of the Banda government's human rights abuses and has called for democratic reform in the country.

In 1996, Chihana was again arrested and imprisoned for his political activities. He was released on bail in 1997, but the government soon afterwards revoked his bail and charged him with plotting to overthrow the government. He was arrested again in 1998 and remained in prison for two years.

In 1999, Chihana was sentenced to 18 years in prison for his role in plotting to overthrow the government. He has been in prison ever since, despite numerous appeals for his release on humanitarian grounds.

Chihana's arrest has sparked international outrage and condemnation. Human rights organisations have called for his immediate release and for the government to respect his fundamental rights.

The Malawian government has denied Chihana's allegations of human rights abuses and has insisted that he is being treated fairly. However, his continued imprisonment has raised concerns about the government's commitment to democracy and human rights.

In 2000, the Malawian government released Chihana from prison on medical grounds. He was allowed to travel to South Africa for treatment of his health issues, but was soon afterwards arrested and sent back to prison.

What is the new SA to do about Malawi?

He says he saw many prisoners executed without trial. They were taken from the jail at night, he says, killed, their bodies cut up, put in bags and dumped in the Shira River for the crocodiles.

Despite that experience Mr Chihana, now 52, voluntarily flew back to Malawi on Monday in order to highlight the lack of freedom in his country and hopefully galvanise the Western democracies — and South Africa — into action.

Two hours later Western diplomats in Lilongwe confirmed that Mr Chihana had indeed been arrested on landing.

Courageous

An early challenge came our way last year when a Malawian dissident leader, Chakufwa Chihana, called here seeking support for his democratic cause in a country where such potential influence happens to be considerable. Hardly anyone took any notice of him. He received more publicity in the European and American media than our own.

Mr Chihana is an extraordinarily courageous man. He fell out with Life President Hastings Banda 32 years ago when he was only 20, which led to him being banished to a remote region where youth leaguers assaulted him and left him for dead with an axe-blade in his head.

Catholic priests rescued him, nursed him back to health and then smuggled him into exile, where he remained for 11 years until his involvement in a trade union strike call in Kenya led to his being deported back to Malawi.

Seven years of imprisonment without trial followed, during which Mr Chihana’s gross maltreatment gained him the status of an Amnesty International prisoner of conscience.

He spent five years in solitary confinement, where he was often chained to the floor, hung upside down, drowned in water and beaten.

would not be incompatible with our relationship to use our influence not only to ensure Mr Chihana’s safety but to encourage Dr Banda to follow our example and democratise his country.

Opposition

There has not been a meaningful election in Malawi since 1961 — before three-quarters of today’s Malawians were born. Five years later Banda declared the country a one-party state, and in 1971 made himself Life President. He appoints all MPs, all executive members of the party, all mayors, councillors, even tribal chiefs.

There is no opposition, no free press, no free public debate. To criticise the government is to commit treason.

Now, at the age of 94, Banda is surrounded by a strange entourage intent on perpetuating the system after he is gone.

But there are now new winds of change blowing across Africa. Elections last October swept Mr Chihana from power in neighbouring Zambia. Last month the Catholic Bishops of Malawi issued a pastoral letter sharply criticising the government for its human rights violations.

Darkness

This sparked attempts to form an opposition movement. Mr Chihana, who returned to Malawi in 1988 as general-secretary of the Southern Africa Trade Union Coordination Council, was invited to a meeting of dissidents in Lusaka. He was detained and interrogated on the way out but eventually made it.

In Lusaka, Mr Chihana publicly identified himself with the bishops’ letter, describing Banda’s Malawi Congress Party in a BBC interview as “a party of darkness and death.”

That was enough to guarantee his arrest when he returned home.

The dissidents formed an interim committee, headed by Chihana, to convene a national conference to plan a democratic future. But before returning he came to South Africa to ask for help.

The American State Department has issued a statement saying it views Mr Chihana’s arrest “in the most serious light” and calling on the Malawian government to release him.

What is the new South Africa going to do?
No SA action on Malawi

SA HAS refused to support US and EC demands that Malawi release democracy campaigner Chikufwa Chihana.

Chihana was arrested when he stepped off a plane from Johannesburg at Lilongwe Airport on Monday. Free trade unionsists and United Front for Multiparty Democracy officials were also arrested. Chihana was returning from a four-week international tour to canvass support for the front SA ambassador to Malawi Hugh Stroebel said yesterday SA would not take any action that might be construed as interference in Malawi's domestic affairs. "Our view is that even though we've been democratising in SA, we can't interfere in Malawi's internal affairs and can't be prescriptive in any way regarding how they (the Malawi government) handle these issues," he said.

The US and UK governments have called for Chihana's immediate release and for an urgent redress of Malawi's human rights record.

Last month, there was a UK-initiated EC démarche to President Kamuzu Banda which made it clear the EC disapproved of Malawi's poor record of government, including human rights. Thus followed the UK's decision last year to cut its aid to Malawi from $10m to $5m.

The démarche also protested against Banda's heavy-handed reaction to a group.

of Roman Catholic bishops who published a letter last month denouncing "corruption and nepotism" in government and attacking its human rights record.

The bishops were later interrogated by Malawian police and their printing press destroyed in an arson attack. Malawi's only university was closed after students voiced their support for the letter.

Sapa reports from Harare that the Malawi government said yesterday its relations with the Roman Catholic Church were "back to normal." Talks between a special Vatican envoy and Banda had removed the "tension" created by the publication of the letter.

Catholic officials in Lilongwe were unavailable for comment.

Before his return home, Chihana said that if the SA government was committed to democratisation, it should at least be vocal in its support for a multiparty democracy campaign in other southern African states.

Stroebel said SA did not agree with this and declined to comment on the argument that SA's lack of action was to show gratitude for Malawi's support and open trade with SA during the apartheid years.

Meanwhile, Sato warned yesterday that unless the Malawi government improved its human rights record and achieved political stability, trade and investment from SA could start to dry up.

Sato's foreign investment expert Andrew Maggs said although Malawi was not a priority market, businessmen would nonetheless stay away from it because of the reports of political discontent.

He said Malawi relied on tobacco and tea exports for most of its forex income. It imported capital equipment and spares, pharmaceuticals, chemicals, agricultural equipment, computer software and a wide range of consumer goods from SA.

ENIGMATIC, AGEING

LONDON — "His autocracy precedes the designation of an heir and he is nearly 80 years old."

The Times was pontificating worryingly that Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda, one of Britain's closest allies in Africa, might soon die and precipitate a succession battle in Malawi.

That was in 1964, the year of Malawi's independence. The Times need not have worried. Even though it got his age wrong — he was then nearly 80 — Banda was destined to remain in place for nearly another 38 years.

But now there is genuine cause for concern. Banda, now about 85 (though officially 87), barely holds the reins of government in Malawi, and a movement for political change has begun.

See editorial on Page 12.

Accepting the need for democracy in Africa, Britain has cut Malawi's aid, which has suffered severe drought and its poor, agriculturally based economy, which has performed poorly. Malawi is also a haven for more than a million Mozambican refugees — an eighth of its population.

Last month's pastoral letter from the country's Catholic bishops, complaining of corruption and a discrepancy between rich and poor, may have sparked a fire that will not be extinguished.

Banda's passing, however, will be more than the demise of just another African dictator. He was at the heart of multiparty democracy that has swept across the continent. It will mark the death of one of the most extraordinary of all the men who ruled African countries in the first 50 years of their independence.

His route to power was, in many ways, the archetypical pattern of African independence. In the last years of British rule he returned to his country from exile, demanded a greater say for Africans, was jailed for allegedly inciting violence, escaped and invited to tea at Downing Street.

He took part in a conference at Lancaster House, secured a agreement with Britain, returned home in triumph, was swept to power in elections and was vindicated.

After independence he turned on some of his former colleagues and locked them up almost a decade after being largely elected he declared himself president for life and suppressed all dissent.

But in other ways he had a different destiny, another life. He left his country as a young man, walked to South Africa, travelled to America and then on to Britain, seeking knowledge and Western education with an unswerving discipline and determination. He returned to Malawi for more than 40 years.

He became a doctor and adopted a puritan Victorian persona. He is an elder of the Church of Scotland, which might be able to help explain the latter from the Catholic bishops, and was a much-loved and fastidious doctor on Tyneside during World War II.

He still keeps in touch with that other world. He flies to London at least once a year and stays discreetly at Claridge’s, often for a month. His British friends are torn between admiration for the shy, awkward but lovable man they once knew and horror at his emotional outbursts and the authoritarianism with which he has ruled his country.

First, the politics Hastings Kamuzu Banda, LRCP and LRCS (Edin), LRFFPS (Glasgow), life president (paramount chief) of Malawi (minister of External Affairs Defence, Justice, Agriculture, Works, Women and Children’s Affairs and Community Services), is known to his people as Nkumwu (conqueror).

Banda came to power on one issue. After World War II, the white rulers in Southern and Northern Rhodesia, now Zimbabwe and Zambia, wanted to incorporate Nyasaland into a federation. London gave way despite the wishes of the African people who repeatedly showed they wanted to remain separate.

In London backed by the Church of Scotland, Banda battled against federation and the white racism he felt it would bring to Malawi, giving precedence to white civil servants, white farmers and foreign interests.

SA monitors Malawian rights abuses

HUMAN rights abuses in Malawi, particularly the arrest of activist Chakufwa Chihana, are being "monitored on a daily basis" by the South African Government, Gert Grobler, the Department of Foreign Affairs' chief director for southern Africa, said yesterday.

An international outcry has followed the arrest on Monday of Chihana as he stepped off a flight at Lilongwe Airport from Johannesburg. On Thursday Zambian riot police broke up an attempted protest by Univer.

versity of Zambia students against his arrest.

Grobler said yesterday the South African Government was monitoring developments in Malawi daily.

The statement appears to repudiate one by the South African ambassador to Malawi, Hugh Stroebel, who was reported to have said South Africa would not take any action that might be construed as interference in Malawi's domestic affairs.

It is, however, understood the Department of Foreign Affairs has not yet taken a final decision on the course of action against Malawi — one of the only African countries to trade openly with South Africa during the years of economic isolation.

The US and UK governments have called for the immediate release of Chihana.

Malawi govt warned of people’s revolt

LUSAKA — The United Front for Multi-Party Democracy in Malawi (UFDM) has warned the government of life-president Dr Kamuzu Banda of a revolt by Malawian people should any harm come to detained pro-democracy activist Chikufwa Chihana.

UFDM leader George Kanyanya said in Lusaka at the weekend the Malawian government risked a revolt should it decide to move Mr Chihana, who was arrested on his arrival in Lilongwe from South Africa last week.

"We are worried about why he (Dr Banda) should be hiding Mr Chihana," said Mr Kanyanya, who reiterated that advocates of democracy in Malawi and elsewhere were calling on the Malawian government to release the political activist.

Diplomatic sources in Harare said that Mr Chihana, chairman of a committee formed to campaign for multiparty democracy in Malawi, had been moved from the prison detention camp in Lilongwe to some unknown destination.

Meanwhile, Mr Kanyanya described as "uncalled for" charges by Malawian High Commissioner to Zambia Dr Lemson Chitsamba that the media were campaigning against his government.

Dr Chitsamba told newsmen, following demonstrations outside the Malawi High Commission in Lusaka by more than 500 University of Zambia students last week, that the media were perpetrating false allegations of human rights abuses in his country.

Malawian activist is 'alive and well'

Malawi's acting ambassador to South Africa, Percy Kachipande, has given the assurance that detained trade union leader Chakufwa Chihana is "alive and well".

Mr. Kachipande said he met with South African Foreign Affairs officials yesterday morning to "discuss the issue", but he refused to give details of the meeting.

Fears for the safety of the 52-year-old dissident leader are growing as the second week of his imprisonment in a Malawian jail draws to a close.

Mr. Chihana was arrested in Lilongwe as he stepped off the plane from Johannesburg on Monday last week.

British and American officials have appealed to the government of President Kamuzu Banda to release him.

Mr. Kachipande said his office had received no details from his government about Mr. Chihana's imprisonment.

He confirmed, however, that Mr. Chihana was being held.

Asked on what charges, Mr. Kachipande said: "On no specific charges, it's "No charges have been laid yet."

Asked if Mr. Chihana was still alive and well, Mr. Kachipande said "Of course, very much alive and well."

He described news reports on the arrest of Mr. Chihana and on human rights abuses in Malawi as "incorrect" and "trash" and said that his office would issue a strong rebuttal of the allegations tomorrow.
Kid-glove treatment for Malawi's 'rebel'

MALAWI'S detention of opposition leader Chakufwa Chihana has caused outrage in surrounding countries and considerable concern among the country's Western and donor nations.

As a result, the Malawian government appears to be exercising unusual caution. According to Chihana's lawyer, Michale Malingo, he has not been mistreated since his detention on April 6. Chihana has not yet been charged, but government sources have indicated that sedition charges will be filed against him. Malingo says it is possible he could be released on bail within two weeks.

Such adherence to legal procedure is highly unusual in Malawi, where the mere suspicion of criticism of Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda and his regime has resulted in the detention without trial of hundreds of people. Numerous cases of harsh prison treatment, including beatings, torture and starvation, have been documented over the years by Amnesty International and Africa Watch.

In an angry protest at Chihana's arrest, Zambians and exiled Malawians demonstrated for two days outside the offices of the Malawian High Commission in Lusaka. They demanded Chihana's release and an end to Malawi's one-party rule.

Western governments have issued public statements of concern over Chihana's detention. President誕nted

Outrage over the detention of Malawi's opposition leader has led to extraordinary official restraint and public support.

By ANDREW MELDRUM

Meanwhile, Banda's reaction has been cautious. He announced an apology to the Catholic Church for the treatment of Chihana, whom he said was suffering from mental health problems. Banda also announced a review of the government's internal security policies.

But Malawians have seen such official statements of concern as symbolic gestures. They believe that Chihana's trial is a sham, and that the government's efforts to stem the flow of information are designed to silence criticism.

The Malawian human rights community is also concerned. They have documented cases of mistreatment and have called for international pressure to be applied to the Malawian government.

Finally, the Malawian government has been urged to respect the rights of its citizens and to ensure that they are treated fairly under the law.

The struggle for democracy in Malawi continues, and the international community remains vigilant in its support for human rights and the rule of law.
HARARE — Malawi’s aged President Kamuzu Banda has confronted the powerful Roman Catholic church in an Easter showdown as pressure builds for an end to 28 years of autocratic rule.

Police ordered Irish Bishop John Roche from the pulpit of his church at Mzamba in northern Malawi during Good Friday mass and told him to leave the country within 24 hours.

Bishop Roche, apostolic administrator for the church in Malawi, was one of seven bishops and an auxiliary bishop to issue a pastoral letter in March criticising Mr Banda’s government for its human rights record and calling for democratic reforms.

He crossed on Saturday into Zambia, where fears were expressed for the safety of the other Catholic church leaders.

“I think that the church was rather shocked by the speed of things,” one senior Western diplomat said yesterday.

The winds of democracy sweeping Africa have so far battered in vain against the wall of autocracy around Malawi. But pressure is building for change.

Mr Banda, declared life president in 1971, has ruled with an iron fist since independence in 1964. He trained as a medical doctor in the United States and Scotland and was ordained an elder in the Church of Scotland.

But he is now in his 70s and looking elderly — he tripped and fell publicly during the Commonwealth heads of government conference last year.

Mapapa Chapela, spokesman for Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance, trade union leader Chafukwa Chihana (81) returned to Malawi on April 6 despite fears that he would be arrested.

Already well acquainted with Malawi’s prison system, he was detained by police on his arrival at Lilongwe airport and is reported to be held in the capital’s jail, despite Western protests.

Western diplomats said a major showdown with Malawi could come next month at a meeting with donor countries.

A diplomat said the European Community had made it clear late last year “that some progress (on human rights and democracy) would be expected and would have some bearing on the meeting.”

While donors will undoubtedly take humanitarian issues into consideration, Malawi can expect a squeeze by the international community to get it to live up to international commitments — such as the African charter on human rights it signed in 1990 and October’s Commonwealth declaration on good governance.

Mr Banda can also expect little sympathy from most African leaders — he maintained diplomatic relations with South Africa, for example, throughout the apartheid period.

But he added that demands for greater democracy and freedom sweeping Africa would not bypass Malawi “Political liberation will come to that country earlier than most of us anticipate.” — Sapa-Reuter
MALAWI. — The government deported a Roman Catholic bishop this weekend for criticising Malawi's human rights record — the latest clash between the church and state, the Archbishop of Malawi, James Chiona, said.

Irish-born Bishop John Roche was delivering a Good Friday mass when police handed him an order giving him 24 hours to leave the country.

He was the first clergyman deported since 1964 when President Hastings Banda kicked out all foreign Jehovah's Witnesses churchmen, although Bishop Roche said another priest's visa was cancelled last week.

Bishop Roche, apostolic administrator for the church in Malawi, was one of seven bishops and an auxiliary bishop who signed and distributed 16,000 copies of a letter on March 8 accusing Malawi's government of human rights abuses and calling for democracy in the one-party state.

Mr Mapapa Chipeta, spokesman for the Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance in Malawi — formed in Lusaka last month — said the committee believed Bishop Roche's deportation had been initiated by Mr John Tembo, Minister of State and President Banda's right-hand man.

"I am very sad and very fearful for the other expatriate fathers and bishops here, and even for my own life," Archbishop of Malawi James Chiona said in a telephone interview from Lusaka.

'Plot to murder Malawi bishops'

LUSAKA — Top ruling Malawi Congress Party leaders plotted to kill the eight Malawi bishops who published a pastoral letter on March 8 condemning president Hastings Kamuzu Banda's government, say Zambian news reports.

They quoted a secret document smuggled out of Malawi and made available to the Catholic Secretariat in Lusaka and the Catholic Africa News Bulletin, which contains details.

The killings were to be carried out unofficially and the two non-Malawian bishops were to be expelled. One bishop, Monsignor John Roche had already been expelled and was now in Chipata, Zambia, the report said.

HARARE — A part-time, Reuters correspondent in Malawi had been released after nearly four months in detention, diplomatic sources said yesterday.

The Malawi government gave no reason for his detention and never announced any charges against him.

Judge orders Malawi to try unionist

LILONGWE — A Malawian judge has ordered the government to bring to trial detained labour leader Chakufwa Chahana today and to explain why he is being held without charge, diplomats say.

Chahana, secretary-general of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Council, was arrested on April 6 after returning from a meeting of Malawian dissidents in neighbouring Zambia.

Chahana promised to organise a national conference on political reform in his country, where political opposition is illegal.

The government said recently it broke the law by attempting to form an organisation to oppose the authoritarian rule of President Kamuzu Banda.

Judge James Kalale ruled yesterday that attorney-general J B Villiers should explain why Chahana was being held without charge or trial, a diplomat said.

Chahana has described Banda's ruling Malawi Congress Party as "as a party of darkness and death" and has called for the ousting of Banda.

Number of jobs ‘will shrink again this year’

CAPE TOWN — Prospects for job seekers this year remain gloomy as employment in the non-agricultural sector is forecast to fall by a further 3.9% this year, says Steellenbosch University’s Bureau for Economic Research director Ockie Stuart in an analysis of economic trends.

This follows last year’s estimated drop of 2.5% in the number of jobs.

The ability of the formal sector to absorb labour has declined from 97% in the sixties, to 72% in the seventies and to 22% in the eighties. Between 1985 and 1990 the level of absorption was 7%. Stuart forecasts a growth of 0.5% in employment next year.

Consumer spending is forecast to recover rapidly from the fourth quarter of 1992, and to continue doing so during the remainder of the forecast period (the end of 1993).” Stuart said he forecast an average growth rate of about 13% for 1993 and 4% in real terms for 1993.

The upturn in world trade towards the end of the year would raise merchandise export earnings by about 3%, in the second half of the year compared with the 1% in the first half, to give an average for 1992 of 8.9%. In 1993 export earnings were projected to grow by 22% as SA benefited from a rise in commodity prices.

Prospects for gold were bleak, with an average gold price of $350.00 forecast for 1993 and $375.00 for 1995. Net gold exports growth 1992 could be 4.1% above last year while 1993 should see a growth of over 13% as mainly to the anticipated depreciation of the rand.

A 7.6% depreciation of the rand against the dollar was predicted for this year and 4.6% for next year.

Stuart forecast a substantially smaller surplus on the current account of balance of payments of about R4.2bn due to the need to import maize.

An average inflation rate of 14% was forecast for 1993 and 12.3% for 1993. Stuart said the estimated 15.5% increase in wages this year and 15.5% next year would contribute to the high inflation rate.

An 8.4% average decline in durable goods expenditure was forecast for this year with a substantial recovery likely early next year. A significant recovery of semi-durable goods expenditure was projected for the first quarter of 1994.

Real gross domestic fixed investment by the private sector, which showed a decline of 6.5% in 1991, is forecast to decline again this year. Next year, however, it should show an increase.

Residents dismiss reports of Malawi coup

BUSINESSES in Malawi’s commercial and industrial city Blantyre had been ransacked by discontented workers over the past two days, residents said yesterday.

They said the looting was not politically inspired and reports of a coup in the country were incorrect. Sapa reported that diplomats in Malawi had said at least 10 people had been killed in the unrest, which had spread to the capital Lilongwe Stores belonging to President Banda were particularly targeted.

The army set up roadblocks outside Blantyre and ordered workers to return to work. Sporadic shooting was heard.

Police halt Harare student protests

Police halted anti-government protests by thousands of rock-throwing students who closed the University of Zimbabwe on Wednesday. Calls for the resignation of President Robert Mugabe and his entire cabinet, for the disbudding of Mugabe's ruling ZANU-PF party and for new democratic elections came from the crowd of students, estimated at 4,000. Hundreds of riot police prevented the students from marching into Harare's city centre where they intended to protest in front of the government offices. The police sealed off the university campus and fired rounds of teargas into the campus to disperse the students. The students planned to demonstrate for more financial grants from the government so the university departments could purchase more books and other teaching equipment. But when they were prevented by police from marching into Harare, the students became angry, started hurling rocks and shouting anti-government slogans.

Churches focus on Malawi

The Southern Africa Alliance of the Reformed Churches urged the Malawi government to release people detained for "exercising their right of free expression". Meeting in Lusaka, Zambia, the leaders of the churches criticized the month-long detention of Malawian labour leader Chakwaka Chihana. A delegation from the World Alliance of Reformed Churches is planning to visit Malawi this month because of concern for "the distinct deterioration of human rights". Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda's government has been blamed by Amnesty International and Africa Watch for mistreatment of political prisoners, but it appears that the international attention focused on Chahakwa Chihana is now causing authorities to go by the book. Chihana was expected to appear in court this week, and his lawyers would press the government to either lay charges or release him. It is believed the government will charge him with sedition.

Europe announces food aid to Africa

The European Community is to provide food aid worth £154 million for African countries struck by drought. Of this, 250,000 tons is to be distributed in southern Africa, including the Red Cross and the World Food Program. EC officials in Brussels said that as soon as they planned to make purchases on the world markets, particularly in South America, ships would begin within a week. The EC itself has a stock of about 1.5 million tons.

Sierra Leone calm with new leader

CALM has returned to Sierra Leone's capital, Freetown. Following the military coup last week which toppled the 18-year rule of President Joseph Momoh, a government council of military officers headed by Captain Valentine Strasser is currently ruling Sierra Leone. Strasser (27) was welcomed last week by crowds of thousands who greeted him as an example of young, dynamic leaders. As a result of looting and violence in Freetown after the coup, the US airlifted 30,000 nationals out of the country while France evacuated its tourists by sea. It is expected the return to law and order will convince those countries to allow their nationals to return.

Food aid arrives in Mogadishu

UN has made a desperate attempt to save off a massive starvation in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, the distribution of emergency food aid has finally begun. A United Nations chartered ship which docked in Mogadishu on Sunday unloaded more than 5,000 tons of wheat. The International Committee of the Red Cross brought relief food aboard from a vessel anchored off Cebrano Beach, south of Mogadishu. These food shipments were the first to reach Mogadishu since November, when serious fighting between rival factions forced the closure of the port.
Malawi calm after challenge to Banda

Argus Africa News Service
JOHANNESBURG. — Malawi was reported quiet today after two days of rioting in Blantyre and Lilongwe that have left President Kamuzu Banda facing the most serious threat to his 28-year rule.

This year has seen a series of challenges to the virtually limitless powers of the 93-year-old patriarch and his two closest lieutenants, Mr. John Tembo and Ms. Cecilia Katambara, culminating in the unrest that appears to have begun as an industrial dispute in Blantyre on Wednesday.

President Banda, who is already facing increasing pressure from Western donor nations and exiled opposition groups, now has to deal with the consequences of the unprecedented violence of the riots. And some foreign commentators have said it is unlikely his regime will be able to weather the pressures for change.

Foreign journalists have not been allowed to enter Malawi since the disturbances began and are having to rely on indirect accounts of the situation.

The Associated Press reports that United States embassy officials are preparing contingency plans for the evacuation of the several hundred Americans in Malawi. Other diplomats are said to have made similar plans.

However, no further disturbances were reported in the country today.

LUSAKA — Police have shot 38 people dead and arrested more than 100 in unprecedented anti-government demonstrations and looting which continued for the second day yesterday in Malawi’s biggest city Blantyre, and spread to the capital Lilongwe, western diplomats said.

The demonstrations in the capital were sparked off by the high court in downtown Lilongwe shouting “We want to see him who is brave.”

Mr. Chihania failed to appear. Earlier, a court had ordered the government to bring him before a court and to explain why he was being detained.

The trade union leader was arrested on April 6 when he landed at Lilongwe’s Kamuzu International Airport and began reading a speech to inaugurate Malawi’s first pro-democracy alliance in nearly 30 years of one-party rule by self-declared Pres. President Hastings Kamuzu Banda.

Meanwhile, in Blantyre diplomats said the continued looting was clearly aimed at the government as all supermarkets belonging to the company owned by President Banda have been looted.

South African ambassador to Malawi Mr. Josef Strobeck dismissed as rumours reports that Malawi had undergone a coup yesterday.

He also denied reports that the presidential palace had been surrounded — Daily Telegraph, Sapa-AP.

38 killed in Malawi riots

AT LEAST 38 people have been reported killed in Malawi riots, a senior Western diplomat said from the capital Lilongwe yesterday.

The diplomat said he understood police figures had shown 38 dead by yesterday morning after two days of disturbances. However, he said the report was unconfirmed.

He dismissed rumours of a coup attempt against President Kamuzu Banda.

More than 100 people were arrested as demonstrators looted stores and clashed with police for a second day yesterday.

Diplomats in the country said the unprecedented unrest in Blantyre and Lilongwe was sparked by the detention of trade union leader Mr Chakufwa Chihana, a political activist detained without charge a month ago.

More than 5,000 people waited outside the courthouse in Lilongwe, where Chihana was due to appear yesterday. "We want to see him who is brave," they shouted.

When Chihana was not brought to court, angry crowds ran alongside the car of defence attorney Mr Bazuca Mhango and Chihana's wife, Jeanne...
Riots rock Malawi

AT least 38 people have been reported killed in rioting in Malawi, a senior diplomat contacted by telephone in the capital Lilongwe said yesterday. The Western envoy said he understood police figures showed 38 dead by Thursday morning after two days of disturbances. He stressed the report was unconfirmed and said peace appeared to have been restored by yesterday afternoon. The diplomat, who declined to be identified, dismissed rumours of a coup attempt against President Kamuzu Banda. "There is no evidence of a coup. Our contacts with the government are normal," he said.

Residents contacted by telephone from neighbouring Zambbia reported police opened fire on demonstrators for a second day yesterday.

Diplomats reported widespread damage as unrest spread from Blantyre to Lilongwe, and said in Blantyre all shops were closed after demonstrators went on a looting spree.

Banda pleads for riots to end

MELINDA HAM

LUSAKA — Malawi's president yesterday pleaded for an end to anti-government riots that have killed at least 38 people, but new unrest was reported in the capital.

Western diplomats said several hundred tobacco workers went on strike yesterday in the capital, Lilongwe, and clashed with police. The diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there were no immediate reports of injuries or arrests.

Quavering voice

Riots broke out on Wednesday in the southern city of Blantyre and spread to Lilongwe, 250 km north, on Thursday. Hospital officials said 38 people were killed and hundreds of others injured. Even the state radio confirmed 36 deaths.

New unrest breaks out, death toll 38

In a quavering voice, President Kamuzu Banda appealed for an end to the unprecedented show of anger at his strict rule: “Let us behave like ladies and gentlemen and refrain from damaging property,” he said in a nationwide radio broadcast monitored in Zomba. “Let us resolve our problems without any loss of life.”

Banda, speaking from his heavily guarded palace in Blantyre, said grievances could be resolved quickly and peacefully. Diplomats said he was in control but appeared willing to resolve labor disputes.

“He’s not bowing to demands for political change,” one diplomat said. “But he’s defused the powder-keg by promising to sort out wage problems.”

Banda has led Malawi since it became independent from Britain in 1964. He declared himself president for life 20 years ago, outlawed political opposition, and passed laws reflecting his puritanical views. Misanjiris are outlawed, as is long hair on men.

There is no television, and movies are strictly censored.

Since independence, government opponents have died, been detained or driven into exile, allegedly on Banda’s orders. The president has denied such charges.

Textile workers

Textile workers in Blantyre went on strike after receiving pay increases of 8 percent, compared with the inflation rate of 20 percent. Their strike quickly drew support from other workers, and it ballooned into protests demanding political reforms.

Police shot at demonstrators, diplomats and witnesses say.

Similar clashes occurred Thursday in Lilongwe when detained labour leader Chakafupa Chibana failed to appear in court to face charges of sedition.

Opposition leaders in exile say Banda, who is believed to be in his 90s, is manipulated by his official hostess and constant companion, Cecilia Kadzamire, and her uncle, John Tembo, heir apparent to the president.

Once-calm Malawi on verge of chaos

TWO countries of the former Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland teetered on the brink of political chaos this week as anti-government protesters fought running battles with paramilitary riot squads in the streets of Malawi and Zimbabwe.

President Kamuzu Banda of Malawi responded to the loss of at least 30 lives in Lilongwe, Blantyre and Limbe with all the ponderous dignity of his 35 years and Victorian origin. In a radio broadcast he appealed to Malawians wearied by nearly 30 years of one-party rule: “Let us behave like ladies and gentlemen.”

Diplomats rejected suggestions of a coup, but said that the perennially placid Malawians “had fire in their eyes” for the first time since Dr Banda’s rise to power in 1962.

Malawi will come under strong pressure from Western donors in Paris tomorrow to improve its record on human rights and democracy, the diplomats said.

The riots broke out on Tuesday over wage demands but took a political twist on Thursday when backers of detained trade unionist and pro-democracy leader Chakufwa Chihana demonstrated outside a court where he was due to appear on sedition charges.

The failure of police to produce Mr Chihana, who was arrested on his return to Malawi last month, at the hearing increased the crowd’s anger.

In Zimbabwe, students fought with police in Harare and Bulawayo. A number of organisations, including trade unions and opposition parties, have demanded the resignation of the government of President Robert Mugabe, 68, amid soaring prices and food shortages partly caused by the drought.

University authorities closed the University of Zimbabwe until May 17 after riots on Thursday. Students started boycotting classes on Wednesday, demanding a 45 percent increase in annual grants and the dismissal of Higher Education Minister David Karumanza. Students in Bulawayo also demonstrated.
Malawi to face music

MALAWI, where up to 38 people were killed this week in riots, will come under strong pressure from Western donors in Paris tomorrow to improve its record on human rights and democracy, diplomats said yesterday.

Malawi would be seeking aid commitments at a three-day World Bank meeting in Paris.

"Major donors have made it absolutely clear that aid is now linked to human rights," said one senior Western diplomat.

"The donors are taking the human rights situation in Malawi very seriously," said another.

The riots broke out on Tuesday over wage demands but took a political twist on Thursday when backers of detained trade unionist and pro-democracy leader Chakufwa Chihana demonstrated outside a court where he was due to appear on sedition charges.

Malawi rues riots where 38 died

HARARE - Malawi's Trade and Industry Minister, speaking in the business centre of Blantyre, deplored rioting that killed up to 38 people and said the government wanted all grievances resolved peacefully.

Mr. Dalton Katopola, whose remarks were carried by the Malawi state broadcasting corporation on Saturday, was one of a number of members of the ruling Malawi Congress Party who addressed meetings in the city and urged calm and respect for the law.

At one meeting, Katopola "deplored the banditry, looting and theft that took place during the week in the city of Blantyre saying this destroyed essential social amenities and facilities, apart from creating a state of insecurity," the radio said.

Katopola said Malawi's leaders wanted all grievances, "including those arising from incomes or working conditions," to be resolved peacefully.

New bid to free Malawian unionist

LUSAKA — International trade unionists were in Malawi yesterday to seek the release of detained union leader and pro-democracy convert Chakufwa Chihana, his lawyer said.

The delegation from the Brussels-based International Confederation of Trade Unions (ICDU) included members from the US, Canada, Britain and Norway, lawyer Baraka Mhango told Reuters.

Mhango said he had not seen Chihana, 52, in spite of securing a High Court order that he be given access to his client after the state failed to produce him for a court hearing on Thursday on sedition charges.

Mhango said he hoped the arrival of the ICDU team might help to apply pressure on the government to give him access to Chihana, who served seven years in jail in the '70s for speaking out against President Kamuzu Banda.

Chihana is among the Malawian exiles, the United Front for Multiparty Democracy (UFMD) which includes the ICDU, said in Lusaka on Saturday it was “dismayed and grieved at the brutality of the government.”

The UFMD demanded the government produce Chihana to prove he was alive.

“The people of Malawi rightly or wrongly believe that Chihana might have been fed to the crocodiles,” it said, adding Banda had earlier pronounced that advocates of a multiparty system of government would be meat for crocodiles.

Strikes spread to rural Malawi

LUSAKA — Unprecedented strikes spread to rural Malawi yesterday as police clashed with hundreds of workers at a tea estate.

Thousands of workers at all major tea plantations continued their strike for better wages for the second day, according to managers interviewed by telephone from neighbouring Zambia.

Yesterday strikers clashed with paramilitary police, but were dispersed with no injuries or arrests, sources said.

Tea is land-locked Malawi’s most profitable export after tobacco and farmworkers traditionally have formed the backbone of President Kamuzu Banda’s Malawi Congress Party.

A delegation from the International Confederation of Trade Unions met Minister of State Mr John Tembo yesterday in a bid to secure the release of the secretary-general of the Malawi-based Southern Africa Trade Union Co-ordinating Congress, Mr Chafukwa Chihana.

Mr Chihana was arrested on April 6 when he returned to Malawi.

When he failed to appear in court last week, some 5,000 supporters rampaged through the streets of Lilongwe — Sapa, Daily Telegraph.
West cuts aid to Malawi over human rights record

HARARE — International trade unionists visited detained Malawian activist Chakufwa Chihana in Blantyre yesterday as Western donors froze most of their aid to Malawi over its human rights record.

International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) Africa chief Andrew Kailumbo said from Blantyre an ICFTU delegation had spent an hour with Chihana at a prison there.

"He has lost weight but he looks okay. It seems he has not been molested."

Kailumbo said charges against Chihana were being prepared and there was no indication when he would face trial.

In Paris, Western donors attending a three-day World Bank meeting froze most of their 1992/93 aid to Malawi for six months because of its poor human rights record, participants said on Wednesday. However, humanitarian aid for drought and refugee relief would continue.

"Donors are seeking tangible and irreversible evidence of a basic transformation in the way Malawi approaches human rights," the Bank said in a statement after the meeting.

The governments agreed to review the resumption of aid as soon as "substantial progress" had been made.

World Bank southern Africa head Stephen Denning said "If progress is made quicker this group (of donors) is ready to come back together..."

He said $220m worth of projects already under way would go on. But donors refused to come up with the $74m Malawi wanted for 1992 and 1993 for non-humanitarian projects.

They pledged only $170m out of the $270m Malawi is estimated to need for drought relief and programmes to help about 1-million refugees from neighbouring Mozambique.

Last week Malawi was rocked by riots when the government failed to produce a statement for a scheduled court appearance.

At least 12 people died in the demonstrations, which spread to the country's tea plantations this week. Tea is the second largest export after tobacco.

Diplomats in Lilongwe said a tea factory was damaged in pay demonstrations on Tuesday. They said managers met yesterday to discuss the situation after giving workers three days' paid leave to help ease the confrontation.

Riot police were used to disperse some demonstrators but no injuries were reported, sources in Malawi said.

The ICFTU delegation, including members from the US, Canada and Britain, saw Chihana shortly after meeting President Kamuzu Banda, who has ruled Malawi with an iron fist since independence from Britain in 1964.

"We are now satisfied and we have received assurances from President Banda that Chihana will get a fair trial, and he also assured us of his safety," said Chihana.

Few cheers as Banda celebrates birthday

By Hans-Peter Bakker

BLANTYRE — President Kamuzu Banda’s birthday party was a decidedly quiet affair despite fears of further unrest following last week’s spate of violence which left at least 39 people dead.

The Malawian leader’s birthday is a national holiday which usually attracts hundreds of thousands of people to the Blantyre celebrations.

The streets of Blantyre were quiet. There were far fewer flags lining the route of his procession than usual and the large numbers of supporters lining the streets were absent.

And the stadium, where more than 80,000 people can be seated, was virtually empty.

Dr Hastings Banda . . .

The official reason given for the low attendance was that the public had been intimidated.

But in a country where violent protests were unheard of until last week, the aftermath of the killings, together with grassroots dissatisfaction with the ruling party, could have contributed to the low turnout.

Dr Banda looked remarkably fit for his estimated 83 years. He was helped up and down stairs, but once on the level he walked fast, as if to prove that he was still the Ngwaz (conqueror or champion).

But his advanced age became more apparent when he spoke. His voice trembled and he slurred as he struggled to form the words.

He said he regretted the loss of lives and appealed for calm.

“Genuine complaints must be addressed in a peaceful manner. Where there is no peace and calm, no unity, there will be no happiness for anybody.”

He added that the violence had been incited by forces from outside the country.
West’s tough present to Banda

HARARE — Malawi’s President Kamuzu Banda celebrated his official birthday yesterday, under international pressure to improve the human rights and democracy record of his country.

Western donor nations announced in Paris on Wednesday that they had cut off new non-humanitarian aid to Malawi, a country of 8.5 million people, until Banda’s one-party government made “substantive progress” on human rights and democracy.

One focus is the fate of democracy activist and trade union leader Chakufwa Chihana, who was arrested last month and is awaiting trial, probably on sedition charges.

Banda, whose official age now is 88, was expected to attend the annual “Kamuzu Day” parade in Blantyre’s 50,000-seat Kamuzu Sports Stadium, diplomats contacted by phone in Blantyre said.

Diplomats, who had driven from the capital Lilongwe, said the country appeared to be quiet after last week’s riots in which at least 22 people died.

Wage strikes spread to tea plantations, the railway and other sectors of the economy this week. “The strikes continue to muddle on, but most employers would seem to be settling fairly fast,” one diplomat said.

International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) Africa desk chief Andrew Kalembo told a news conference in Lilongwe on Wednesday night the Malawian government said it was raising the minimum wage to contain the situation.

Kalembo visited Malawi as part of an ICFTU delegation pressing for the release of Chihana. It was clear the strikes were not spontaneous, he said. “There is leadership in the strikes, but they are still underground.”

The ICFTU delegation saw Chihana in a Blantyre prison on Wednesday and told the Luaka news conference he appeared to be “physically and mentally okay.” The delegation, including members from the US, Canada, Britain, Norway and Africa, saw Chihana after a meeting with Banda on Wednesday.

Chihana was arrested at Lilongwe airport on April 6 after he returned from meetings with Malawian exiles in Zambia and SA. While in Zambia he was elected chairman of an Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance in Malawi.

No democracy, no money for Malawi

International trade unionists saw detained Malawian democracy activist Chakufwa Chihana in Blantyre this week as Western donors froze most of their aid to Malawi over its human rights record.

Andrew Kalembo, Africa department head of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), said an ICFTU delegation had spent an hour with the imprisoned Chihana.

"He has lost weight, but he looks okay. It seems he has not been assaulted," Kalembo said.

He said charges against Chihana were still being prepared and there was no indication of when he would face trial.

In Paris, Western donors at a three-day meeting with Malawian officials froze most of their 1992/93 aid to Malawi for six months because of its poor human rights record. However, humanitarian aid for drought and refugee relief would continue.

The unofficial count was at least 38 casualties.

Diplomats in Lilongwe said a tea factory had been damaged in pay demonstrations this week.

Managers gave workers three days' paid leave to help ease the confrontation. Riot police had been used to disperse some demonstrators but no injuries were reported, sources said.

Chihana, who is also a top African trade union leader, was arrested on April 6 at Lilongwe Airport on his return from meetings with Malawian exiles in Zambia and South Africa. In Zambia he was elected chairman of an Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance in Malawi.

Kalembo said Banda himself did not know the charges against Chihana. "The charges against Chihana are still being prepared," the unionist said.

For the first time in its history, Malawi is free. The struggle for independence has been long and arduous, but the victory is ours.

Western powers are watching, waiting to see how the new government will fare. They hope for stability and progress, but they are also wary of the potential for instability and conflict.

I think it is because I have seen the good and the bad that I can say with confidence that Malawi is on the path to a brighter future. The people are hardworking and determined, and they will not be easily broken.

The government is working hard to address the challenges that face the country, and I am confident that they will succeed. The road ahead will not be easy, but the people of Malawi are ready to face it.

'A cop sold me out', says hostel inmate

A HOSTEL inmate was threatened with death after a white police officer sold him out to the Inkatha Freedom Party.

The witness, who may not be named, said while living at the hostel, several IFP leaders came to address the inmates. The leaders encouraged the hostel dwellers to fight African National Congress followers, especially because of attacks on IFP members in Tokozza at the time.

He said in 1990 he heard that a reward was being offered by the police for information on illegal weapons.

Later that year he went to Pinetown Police Station where he met Detective Warrant Officer Sjula Sithole, who was in the firearms unit and who was involved in the reward offer.

"I was introduced to Captain Kruger and I gave him information about people who were in possession of firearms. Acting on this information the police went to the hostel and found the firearms, and I was paid for the information," he said.

He continued working for the police and attended several meetings at the hostel, some of which were addressed by Mr Thams Khosa, Transvaal youth leader of the IFP.

He said he continued reporting people with firearms, and arrests were made as a result of his information.

He also identified people who took part in attacks.

The witness said a number of meetings were held at which plans to attack trains and commuters at railway stations were discussed, and how the attacks were carried out.

He said that in November last year he was told by his cousin, who also lived at the hostel, that he was to be killed because he was a police informer. He escaped through a window.

Later he was told by his police contact that a Captain Vermaak had told him out to the hostel dwellers.

He complained he was not paid the promised R10 000 for information about a train attack in 1990 last year.

He said a further R30 000 reward for information on a train attack had still not been paid.

He said the main reason for the ongoing violence was that Zulus did not want to be ruled by Khosas.

Economic pressure on Banda regime

By ANDREW MELDREUM

The refusal of the World Bank and top Western donors to grant Malawi US$74-million has added economic pressure to the political pressures facing President Hastings Kamuzu Banda's regime.

Last week's decision in Paris by the key donors to veto any new aid, except for humanitarian aid to Malawi's 1.2-million refugees and the drought-stricken population, comes as a bitter blow to Banda and Munster of State John Tembo, who is widely regarded as the country's real ruler.

For nearly 30 years the Banda government has relied on economic support from the Western powers and has been held up as one of Africa's most successful models of free-market economics. But in addition to growing international outrage about its abysmal human-rights record, the World Bank has recently slated its economy as being grossly distorted to squeeze wealth from rural peasants into the pockets of Banda, Tembo and a select group of cronies.

This skewed economic system has left Malawi with a rural population trapped in grinding poverty and with the world's highest child mortality rate. According to the World Bank's 1992 World Development Report, the mortality rate for children under five averages 248 deaths per 1,000 births, compared to 204 in war-torn Mozambique, 89 in South Africa and 72 in Zimbabwe.

"Malawi is blessed with rich, fertile soil and, usually, abundant rains. The rural people should produce enough food to ensure they are well fed, at the very least," comments an international aid worker. "Instead, the farmers are forced to grow cash crops that are exported. Many do not produce enough food crops to support their families for a full year and as a result many rural Malawians go hungry a few months each year."

Malawi is one of Africa's least urbanised countries, with 88 percent of the population living in the rural areas. The tiny country is also one of Africa's most densely populated, meaning that each family has relatively small three to five hectare plots.

Rural life does not mean being free from politics as Banda's Malawi Congress Party (BCP) is built on a network of Women's Leagues and Pioneer Youth Leagues which reach into every village. Very few Malawians are brave enough to refuse purchasing membership in the BCP, for which they must pay in cash. And whenever a BCP official visits an area, the residents are asked to give a cash donation.

In order to earn cash, the peasants grow tobacco, tea and cotton which they sell to Malawi's sole agricultural marketing corporation, owned by Banda. The company, Admarc, sets low prices for the commodities and then sells them at substantially higher market prices overseas.

The stranglehold monopoly which Admarc and Banda's industrial conglomerate, Press Holdings, have over the economy was criticised by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in the early 1980s. When Malawi began a structural adjustment programme, the international finance groups stated that the companies had to be separated from government policies and that Banda would have to divest himself of control of the companies.

But the new president and his advisers managed to sidestep the finance institutions, and today Admarc is still widely understood to be owned by Banda and those closest to him.
A nation’s fury saved for whores, dancers

A beautiful young girl who should be wearing a school uniform rather than a sequinned dress walks into a hotel and heads for the bar.
She orders a soft drink and sits alone, sipping her drink slowly. Eventually, a man will come up and offer to buy her another.
Mia, 16, is a "freelancer," the local euphemism for prostitute.
In Malawi, 69 percent of women are illiterate and Mita is one of them. "Freelancing" is the only way she can earn a living.
According to official statistics, 31 percent of six-year-old girls are enrolled in schools here every year. Of these, only 15 percent finish secondary school.
By Std 8, girls represent only 25 percent of the student population. This makes the drop-out rate a contributing factor to the high female illiteracy rate in Malawi.
Young women are "backward" are as depressing and stereotypical a feature of Malawi as the women who populate Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda's regime.
It would be difficult to say which is most oppressive for these women being forced to rent out their nubile bodies or having to wear the image of an unpopular tyrant across their maternal breasts and buttocks to keep up with the party.
The dancing women are a common sight at Kamuzu International Airport in Lilongwe, the capital city, whenever Banda travels or meets a state guest. Large numbers of women, wearing chitenge (cloths) bearing Banda's portrait, turn out to dance and salute enthusiastically.
During the recent riots in Blantyre and Lilongwe, the cloth featuring Banda's face played a symbolic role.

In Lilongwe, riots were sparked off by the non-appearance in court of trade union leader and pro-democracy activist Mr. Chakufwa Chikwana. When Banda returned to Malawi on April 6 to announce the formation of the first pro-democracy alliance in 28 years of one-party rule under Banda's Malawi Congress Party ( MCP),
He was arrested at the airport and denied access to his lawyer, Mr. Baskia Mhango, and his relatives.
His arrest heightened fears that he had been killed. 5,000 of his supporters took to the streets shouting shops, overturning cars and stripping women of the chitenge bearing Banda's portrait.
In Blantyre, the demonstrations began the day before, when more than 3,000 workers at the David Whitehead Textile Factory—which produces most of the colourful Malawian chitenge—went on strike to demand higher wages.
They marched into the centre of town where they were joined by security guards as well as transport and local council workers.
But they were attacked by Malawi Young Pioneers and the peaceful demonstration turned into a riot that lasted two days.
Rioters stripped and beat women wearing chitenge unprinted with Banda's face.
The dancing women and "freelancers" have a lot in common. Where the dancing women are now at the receiving end of worker rage, the "freelancers" have had to endure the wrath of the state.
Prostitution here is a crime and offenders can be jailed for up to two years.
The "freelancers" stalk hotels looking for clients who pay anything up to R200 for a night.
A few local men say they prefer to negotiate terms beforehand.
"Otherwise you will end up paying through your nose. She can easily make a scene as others have done before," says one.
At most nightclubs and bars it is easy to buy sex from bartenders. Many of them are employees of the establishment and charge as little as R10 for "short-time sex."
But in Lilongwe, the story is different. Because of the thriving tobacco industry, many "freelancers,"" he said, "are working in tobacco factories bulge with cash following successful sales."

Five of the "freelancers" interviewed said they were school dropouts who had tried unsuccessfully to find other employment.
The advent of AIDS appears to be slowing—but not stopping—the numbers of girls turning to prostitution. Health experts say 80 percent of prostitutes in Malawi are HIV positive.
Malawi has launched a high-profile publicity campaign against AIDS. Bartenders, prostitutes and long-haul drivers are some of the targets of this campaign.
But in many cases, say "freelancers," they dare not refuse sex if clients won't use condoms because they don't want to be out of a job.
Like the dancing women, who dare not refuse to turn up on state occasions — AIA
Fewer of the people questioned, however, bought (or planned to buy within a month) houses, furniture or stoves.

Significantly, the most noticeable aspect was that most of the buying was done by blacks, according to the HSRC’s Andrew Whitesford. “This means a huge increase in the size of the market for manufactured goods. This should enable manufacturers to benefit from economies of scale. It also indicates that redistributive forces in the economy — such as scrapping legislation that restricted black economic activity, and the pursuit of affirmative action programmes by many companies — are working.”

Consumer sentiment is sensitive to changes in employment and income — changes in consumer expectations usually presage a shift in a country’s economic growth rate by three to six months.

The HSRC’s survey, done for the first time last year, will now be conducted quarterly. It canvases roughly 1,900 people across the country, excluding Transkei and Bophuthatswana. Business confidence is sampled regularly but this is the only survey that measures consumer confidence. The findings are based on answers to questions on, among other things, unemployment, economic growth, household incomes and their relationship to inflation, and durable-goods buying patterns.

The latest survey shows that the ravages of inflation continue to reduce most people’s real incomes, with the exception of black managers, professionals and clerical workers. Of those questioned, only 6% had income increases higher than the rate of inflation.

The survey also found that only 4% believe the employment picture improved in the previous six months, while 82% maintain unemployment has increased. Nevertheless, 24% believe an improvement is on the cards.

Of those surveyed 51% feel the economy declined in the previous six months but only 30% believe this trend will continue in the next six. On this question, whites were more pessimistic than blacks.

Banda too brittle to bend with the wind

WHEN the 87-year-old Malawian president Hastings Banda 'slipped and fell at the Commonwealth Summit last October the photographed incident was splashed by the Zimbabwean press amid speculation about whether old age might eventually force one of the continent's longest-serving heads of state finally to call it a day.

In Malawi, however, the country's sole daily newspaper, the government-owned Daily Times, reported Banda's arrival in Zimbabwe on the front page in reverential detail but no mention was made of the fall.

In a country where journalists face life imprisonment for passing on false or critical information to foreigners and where opponents have been ruthlessly silenced, the omission was only to be expected.

Since he became leader of the former Nyasaland in 1964, Banda has run the country like a personal fiefdom, taking one-party rule to extremes.

Apart from being President for Life and commander of the armed forces, he is also Minister of Foreign Affairs, Home Affairs, Defence, Justice, Agriculture, and Work and Supply. He is officially known as Ngwazi, meaning 'conqueror'.

'Earlier this month the picture of peace and prosperity which Malawi has endeavoured over the years to project to the outside world was shattered by a pastoral letter published by the country's Catholic bishops.

In it they deplored Malawi's poor human-rights record and the growing gap between rich and poor. More significantly, they called for the introduction of multi-partyism.

It was the first time that a call for democracy had been made from within Malawi.

The clerics were immediately detained and interrogated by the security police, prompting the Vatican to send one of its senior envoys to try and calm State-church tensions.

Fired by the bishops' unprecedented boldness, Banda's opponents, reduced by repression at home to fighting a rearguard battle in exile, are gathering strength.

Chakufa Chihana, a prominent trade unionist based in Zambia, dared to step on Malawian soil a few weeks ago and was immediately arrested.

He had intended publicly to challenge Banda's rule and was probably well aware of the fate awaiting him, having already spent seven years in a Malawi prison.

Astonished South African tourists watched aghast as Chihana was bundled into the back of a car by security forces as he stepped off a plane from Johannesburg.

A speech he attempted to read before it was snatched away from him and Malawians had had enough of three decades of intimidation and victimisation, he has not been seen or heard of since. A Belgian delegation of trade unionists is now in the country in a bid to see him.

The extraordinary incident will not have been lost on the British Foreign Office which now sees Banda as an irritant to its efforts to promote multi-party rule in Africa.

Britain, the former colonial ruler and one of the country's most generous donors, has already fired a warning shot by cutting back on much needed aid, a move which could be followed by other lenders if Banda fails to change.

But for years the West has turned a blind eye to his excesses, preferring to see the lack of opposition against him as an oasis amid the revolutionary turmoil raging through the rest of southern Africa.

As a result, Banda has virtually carried on regardless since sweeping to victory in elections on the platform of the nationalist Malawi Congress Party (MCP) in 1964.

BETRAYAL

Very quickly he betrayed signs of his intentions and there were complaints by ministers about his lack of consultation, his self-aggrandisement and his nepotism.

In 1971 he elected himself President for Life and former colleagues and associates who dared to criticise him were gradually forced into exile or jailed.

A number have since been mysteriously murdered, including two ministers, Dick Matenje and Andrew Gandama, who were said to have been shot in 1983 while trying to flee by car.

But in the West Banda was regarded as a voice of moderation, largely because of his right-wing foreign policy. In 1967 he took the unprecedented step of establishing diplomatic links with apartheid SA and rolled out the red carpet for John Vorster three years later.

Banda - who ruled against white colonists during the campaign for independence - also refused to impose sanctions on Rhodesia once he was in power and regarded the Portuguese colonists in neighbouring Mozambique as 'friends and brothers'.

Many years later he was accused by Mozambique of helping the South African-backed Renamo rebels in their brutal war against Frelimo.

In return Banda became the recipient of South African largesse - it helped finance the building of the new capital at Lilongwe - as well as regular cash injections from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

But any prosperity that Malawi experienced was short-term. Today the country is feeling the pinch like its neighbours, as chief exports like tobacco and tea are hit by the vagaries of the world market and worsening drought. Most Malawians are desperately poor and also illiterate; life expectancy is low and infant mortality high.

According to the London-based campaigning journal Index on Censorship, an atmosphere of terror continues to pervade the country.
Banda acts on political card practice

HARARE — Malawi's President Kamuzu Banda, facing growing opposition to one-party rule, has ordered officials to stop demanding party cards from shoppers and bus passengers, the official news agency Mana reported yesterday.

It quoted Dr Banda as saying he had never sanctioned the practice, which has been in force for years.

The agency also said Dr Banda had ordered his lieutenants to crack down on "thieves" who "pose as party leaders" forcing people to contribute gifts for him.

His authoritarian government has been widely accused of human rights abuses, including the torture and detention without trial of opponents.

He has denied the accusations.

Thousands rioted during politically tense strikes for higher pay last month — Malawi's worst chaos in three decades.

HARARE — Malawi's central bank governor, Hans Lesschaert, yesterday denied the country faced a foreign exchange crisis or that dealings were suspended.

He said in a telephone interview from Lilongwe that approvals for import licences had slowed last week "because we have a bit of a cash-flow problem in terms of foreign exchange".

But things were now back to normal and Malawi was sticking to a trade liberalisation programme agreed with the World Bank and IMF.

He said there was also no question of a moratorium on debt repayments.

Lesschaert, on secondment to Malawi from the German central bank, said the problem had been caused by slow foreign exchange remittances from abroad for Malawian tobacco exports.

He said foreign exchange transactions were normal, although diplomats in the Malawian capital said there still appeared to be a ban on such dealings at commercial banks.

"There is confusion over foreign exchange transactions and we expect guidelines to be issued tomorrow," said a senior Western diplomat.

Lesschaert said however; "I think there is no need for guidelines. There is no ban on foreign exchange dealings."

"There was a slowdown in import approvals last week. Now you can go to the bank and get your foreign exchange and import your goods."

Diplomats said last Friday the central bank had issued an order early last week suspending foreign exchange dealings. This was followed by a statement from the bank and Finance Ministry saying the instructions had been issued in error.

Some diplomats suggested Malawi's foreign exchange "cash flow" problem could be linked to a decision by international donors last month to halt all but humanitarian aid until Malawi improved its human rights and democracy record.

Lesschaert also denied reports to Lilongwe that he had resigned.

He said his contract was due to expire at the end of June and he had not renewed it. — Sapa-Reuters

Man freed after 27 years

LUSAKA — A man detained for 27 years without trial and seven other political prisoners were freed yesterday by the Malawi government, said diplomats reached by telephone.

Human rights groups and foreign governments had called for the release of the men and other opposition figures held in Malawi.

"I am very, very happy," said Machipisa Munthali (97) imprisoned without trial for alleged treason in 1965. He spoke in a telephone interview from the commercial capital of Blantyre.

"The international pressure forced the government to free me," Munthali said, adding he lived the final years of detention in a cell 1 m wide and 2 m high and was denied visitors.

Munthali said he was excited about growing political opposition to the government and calls for a return to Western-style democracy. "I always wanted Malawi to be free," he said. "That's why I was detained in the first place."

Death claims

President Kamuzu Banda, believed to be in his 90s, led Malawi to independence from Britain in 1964. He outlawed political opposition by declaring a one-party state and named himself president for life.

Human rights groups claim Banda has assassinated, detained or driven into exile opponents into exile. Banda denies the charges, saying his 8 million people support the one-party state.

In recent weeks, unprecedented anti-government violence has rocked the capital of Lilongwe and other centers.

As many as 30 people have been killed in clashes with police, according to diplomats. Officially, the government put the death toll at 22.

Other known detainees in Malawi include labor leader Chikuwa Chihana, who was detained on April 6 when he flew into Malawi after calling for a pro-democracy forum. Foreign nations have called for Chihana to be put on trial or released. Last month, western aid donors froze about K20 million in new aid for Malawi because of accusations of human rights violations.

Banda has announced parliamentary elections will be held in June with all candidates from his Malawi Congress Party.

ANC president Nelson Mandela yesterday paid a one-day visit to Malawi, a staunch supporter of SA through the apartheid years.

The ANC confirmed the visit but would not comment further on a report from the official Malawi news agency that Mandela was in the country to meet Malawian President Kamuzu Banda.

Banda has come under international criticism for his government's repression of protest. Up to 38 people were killed in May when police fired on an anti-government demonstration.

Mandela was reportedly received at Blantyre's airport by Banda's likely successor, Minister of State John Tembo.

The visit is unable to provoke controversy, as Malawi, aside from its human rights record, is the only African country to have kept full diplomatic ties with SA throughout its isolation.

Mandela this week snubbed Kenyan President Daniel arap Moi on his visit to SA, because Moi had met President F W de Klerk to become the first African head of state to meet an SA leader in SA since Banda in 1971. Kenya yesterday defended the meeting.

Cane-growers in line for R130m drought relief aid

SA CANE growers could receive R130m in drought relief aid from government. SA Cane Growers' Association chairman Lawrie Gordon-Hughes said yesterday.

Gordon-Hughes announced in Durban details of a government relief plan designed to ease the plight of the drought-devastated cane-grower.

"The relief measures will assist in supplementing the growers' cash flow and survival, but at a cost — loans have to be repaid," he said. The average farm's indebtedness of R500 000 was at a level which gave "great cause for concern".

In terms of the drought relief scheme, the grower would be eligible to borrow up to R190 000 of crop loss relief. The farmer would be obliged to replant, at a cost of more than R3 900 a hectare, those parts of his farm where the cane had died.

"In total, we estimate relief loans required could amount to as much as R130m,"

Gordon-Hughes said the average commercial grower, who normally produces close to 8 900 tons of cane, could face a 60% crop drop due to the drought. He added the result could be a revenue loss of more than R200 000 for each farmer after taking into account variable cost savings.

Gordon-Hughes said current production of close to 1.5 million tons of sugar could easily meet domestic demand, but exports would be badly affected.

The association's report says export losses for the industry may cost cane-growers R300m, as sugar production came in 750 000 tons short. As a result, SA has had to import sugar at skyrocketing world market prices to meet its export commitments. And, the industry price of sugar shot up 14.5%, passing on a 24c increase to the consumer.

The SA Sugar Association denied the price increase resulted from the importation of sugar. An association spokesman said, at the time, the sugar industry had annual price increases which were unrelated to world prices.

Our Durban correspondent reports that the R15m second phase of a major sugar-growing project in north Pondoland, which will create 400 new sugar farmers and eventually generate R4m a year, was launched this week at a ceremony at Bizana near the Natal-Transkei border.
Mandela, Banda in talks?

JOHANNESBURG — Mr Nelson Mandela yesterday paid a one-day visit to Malawi — reportedly to meet President Kamuzu Banda.

Dr Banda has come under widespread international criticism for his government's repression of protest. Up to 38 people were killed in May when police fired on an anti-government demonstration.

Mr Mandela was reportedly received at the airport in Blantyre, Malawi's largest city, by Minister of State Mr John Tembo, widely seen as Dr Banda's likely successor. The ANC leader is believed to have been scheduled to meet Dr Banda later yesterday.

Malawi is the only African country to have kept full diplomatic ties with South Africa.

Dr Banda has recalled parliament — dissolved in April — for an emergency session today to vote on a bill which proposes to allow the government to borrow money for drought relief.

Malawi may now pay up

JOHANNESBURG.—Mr. Nelson Mandela’s meeting with Malawi President Hastings Banda on Wednesday could be linked to Malawi’s decision to pay dues to the OAU’s liberation committee, observers said. Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Mr. Pik Botha said he did not believe there would be a problem with South Africa’s membership of the OAU once a transitional government was installed.
ANC president Nelson Mandela met embattled Malawi president Hastings Banda on Wednesday on an unscheduled visit diplomatic observers said could be linked to Malawi’s recent decision to pay outstanding dues to the OAU liberation committee.

The Malawi embassy yesterday refused to comment on the visit, which took observers by surprise. Malawi was the only African country with Pretoria ties.

It is understood Mandela and PAC president Clarence Makwetu had been sent invitations to meet Banda, who faces intense pressure from Western donor nations over Malawi’s human rights record. A Malawi government message with the invitations said it would pay its outstanding dues to the OAU liberation committee.

OAU officials said recently the liberation committee was still assisting the ANC and the PAC Malawi has played an insignificant role in OAU activities.

An ANC spokesman said yesterday that Mandela had undertaken to visit all African countries on his release. His Malawi visit was part of this plan. However, ANC spokesman Carl Niehaus said Mandela’s diary had had to be changed to accommodate the unscheduled visit.
Malawi waits in trepidation

By ROBIN DENSELOW

Ndirande township is an area of poor, single-storey houses and shacks that sprawl across the hillside behind Blantyre’s industrial estate.

In the morning, smoke from hundreds of wood fires hangs over the dirt track where streams of workers set out on foot for the town and factories. When they return in the evening, a sinister atmosphere permeates the township as conversation focuses on curfews, police harassment and arrests.

By 8pm, an armed guard is in place outside the local supermarket owned by the Press Trust, in which Malawi’s Life President Hastings Banda has a major interest. After that, Ndirande residents say, only the foolhardy venture out.

It was here that riots began last month, after a dispute at the Lonrho-owned David Whitehead textile factory. Strikers were joined by hundreds of other workers and students from the Blantyre Polytechnic. They surged into the town centre for a 24-hour rampage of looting — with a noticeable preference for Banda’s supermarkets — and were met by armed police. At least 38 were killed and 127 wounded.

The workers have since received a pay rise, but the demand for more fundamental change remains.

The rioters were encouraged by the return in April of trade unionist Chokwé Chihana, who has founded a pressure group for multi-party democracy in Malawi. Chihana was arrested at the airport and is still being held at Zomba Prison. His lawyers say they do not know whether he will be brought to trial, or what the charges will be.

Chihana is the hero of many Malawi workers. His supporters say there have been more than 2,000 arrests since the riots and that police are searching out people in possession of pro-democracy material faxed into Malawi from Zambia, then hurriedly photo-copied and distributed.

Frightened Ndirande residents, who refuse to be named or taped by journalists, say Banda is still loved by his people but they fear Minister of State John Tembo, who is expected to become Banda’s successor.

It appears that Banda is concerned about the recent uprisings — and perhaps about Tembo’s growing power — and is trying to defuse the situation. He has recently shown a slightly more liberal paternalism, insisting that no one should be forced to give gifts to his Malawi Congress Party (MCP) or to buy party cards.

But he is still making no concessions to those who want a multi-party democracy and is going ahead with this month’s one-party elections, in which all candidates have to be approved by the MCP and granted certificates by the president.

There are predictions that when Banda’s 27-year rule comes to an end, there will be a clampdown by Tembo and an uprising by supporters of Chihana. But there are those in Ndirande who say they cannot wait that long — “The Guardian
National Olympic flag to the Barcelona Olympics in July.

Sports authorities have abandoned the old system of sending "tourists" — the term here for sportspeople with no chances of winning medals — to international competitions.

The new stance was explained recently by a top official of the government-controlled Malawi National Council of Sports during a meeting held in Blantyre to review prospects of sending a team of Malawian sportspeople to the highly competitive Olympics Games.

The council's executive secretary Mark Tembo told members of the local Olympic and Commonwealth Games Association of Malawi (OCGAM) and other national sporting bodies that a streamlined team was a necessity because of dismal performances in the past by Malawian sportspeople in international competitions, including the last All Africa Games hosted by Egypt.

Malawian athletes came back from Cairo empty-handed, much to the chagrin of fans and sports authorities who had hoped Malawi would have something to show for the cost, in excess of K150 000 (R140 000), of sending a team of runners and boxers to Cairo.

During the Olympic Games hosted by South Korea in 1988, Malawi spent close to K300 000 (R280 000) sending its team of "tourists" to Seoul. Is it still worthwhile sending a team to Barcelona?

This question proved a bit difficult to answer for coaches who were being asked to prove that the athletes had achieved Olympic qualifying standards.

Cycling coach Davis Storey reported that none of his cyclists was up to scratch, especially since they had not been exposed to any outside competitors. "We are not adequately prepared to go," he said.

Because of their poor performance at the All Africa Games, Malawian boxers were given a second chance for qualifying fights in Morocco this year. They have since been told they will be unable to go to Barcelona because of financial constraints.

"We are very disappointed. How do sports authorities expect us to improve?" complained national boxing coach Thomas Banda bitterly.

The only sport assured of its participation in Barcelona is athletics, whose national coach Isaac Phiri pins his hopes on marathon runner John Mwathwa and Canadian-based Malawian runner Smartex Tambala.

Mwathwa came fifth in the marathon distance in Cairo, well within qualifying standards for that Olympics.

"If given the chance to train harder, Mwathwa can do something for Malawi," says his coach.

However, the coach hopes to switch Mwathwa to the 10 000 m event and let Smartex Tambala compete in the marathon. Tambala's present marathon record is 2 hours 17 seconds for 42,195 kilometres.

The new stance of the sports authorities has not gone down well among officials of various national sporting bodies here who feel the government expects miracles from sportspeople when it has not invested heavily in sports facilities and infrastructure.

"There is a lack of basic facilities and infrastructure in this country. "We might as well forget about sending our sportspeople to the competitions until the government is prepared to invest in sports," said one official.

Another official agreed that sportspeople needed competition: "We need that kind of exposure; otherwise the abundant talent and skill here will remain under-exploited. We cannot begin talking of medals when no major investment in sports has been made." — AIA

Malawi's (non) voters show their discontent

By MELINDA HAM and MIKE HALL

MALAWI's pro-democracy activists blasted the unprecedented low turnout for last weekend's parliamentary elections as indicating widespread popular support for democratic change.

"What's significant is that previously people felt compelled to vote because they were scared of what might happen if they didn't," said Mapopo Chipeta, a Harare-based member of the opposition Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance led by detained trade unionist Chakufwa Chilima.

The government was extremely cagey about releasing specific voting figures, though in a face-saving measure not supported by any statistics an election spokesman claimed that the national turnout was 80 percent.

Diplomats who monitored the poll quickly dismissed this claim.

One Western official estimated that less than half the 1.5-million voters cast ballots and an envoy who visited polling stations in the north said some stations were completely empty.

Western donors who froze $74-million of new aid to Malawi in May looked to these elections as a sign of democratic progress and as a gauge of popular support for the regime. But, as one diplomat put it, "The elections did nothing to improve international opinion of the government. Rather, they have shown that even the Malawian people are fed up."

Candidates in the elections, which are held every five years, are not allowed to campaign and this year a third of them — mostly ministers — were elected unopposed, while polls in five constituencies were postponed because the ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP) rejected all the candidates.

"Unlike other years, when the zealous MCP Young Pioneers "encouraged" voters to cast their ballots and even provided transport in large lorries, this year voters were left to make their own choice."

Few incidents of intimidation were reported countrywide, though in some isolated villages voters were threatened that if they did not vote they would be denied drought relief.

The low turnout may encourage pro-democracy activists inside the country to step up their activities, but they are still unlikely to come out in open. "They are still haunted by the prospect of repression, including extra-judicial execution," said the Democratic Alliance.
About 100,000 Rwandan villagers suffer from river blindness, a disease caused by a parasite called filaria, which is transmitted by the bite of a black fly found in nearby rivers.

Diet lacking in vitamin A have also been listed as a contributory factor.

It is estimated that over 600,000 people suffer from blindness in the country.

The International Eye Foundation has provided financial aid to fight the disease.

Through what they call the Invermectin project, the foundation’s eye experts hope to wipe out this disease, which has affected communities in West Africa, parts of Latin America and Yemen in the Middle East.

US drug to treat disease

The World Health Organisation says 350,000 people have been blinded by the disease worldwide.

In the past, the drug ivermectin (diethylcarbamazine) was used on Thyolo patients, but its side effects are severe itching and swelling of limbs.

The new drug, Invermectin, will combat blindness if the drug is used early.

Thyolo residents are being encouraged to take the drug, whether infected or not.

Only pregnant women and children weighing less than 15 kg are not allowed to take it.
Techserve wins sweet deal

THE Suco Ma sugar factory in Malawi has granted a £10m expansion contract to Durham-based engineering company Techserve.

The work at the factory includes construction of a new plant, Techserve MD Jeff Walsh said yesterday.

Most of the funding for the project will come from the Industrial Development Corporation (IDC), which has agreed to grant Techserve an export credit loan worth £5m. The additional £5m needed for the expansion has been financed by the Lorrho-controlled Sugar Corporation of Malawi. Lorrho has a managerial contract, as well as a majority interest in the Sugar Corporation.

The project will increase Suco Ma’s capacity by more than 8%, up to 300 tons of cane per hour.

Ethnic killings in Mali

Four people were killed and 200 fled their homes in northern Mali in an outbreak of racial conflict between black and "white" groups. In the past year tensions have built up between Mali's various ethnic groups, especially between black Africans and the Arab populations. Radio Liberta, based in the capital Bamako, said blacks in the Saharan city of Gao launched a broad attack against Arabs, Moors and Tuaregs.

Banda defends detention record

Malawi's President Hastings Kamuzu Banda publicly defended his government's record of detentions of political opponents. The 92-year-old Malawi leader addressed the nation to mark the country's 28th independence anniversary on July 6. Banda said detention in Malawi had been used to protect national security and not to abuse human rights, as Malawian and international critics have charged.

Four United Nations military observers were threatened with expulsion from Somalia by a warlord, Mohammed Farah Aideed, who controls much of the battle-scarred capital, Mogadishu. The observers had arrived in Mogadishu this week to prepare the ground for a larger group that is to monitor the ceasefire between warring factions in the Somali capital.

The chairman of Zaire's National Pro-Democracy Conference asserted it had full authority in the troubled central African state, directly contradicting claims by President Mobutu Sese Seko. Liberian clashes continue

New fighting has broken out in western Liberia between fighters loyal to rebel chief Charles Taylor and a small militia, Ulimo. Local newspapers reported heavy shelling from both sides as Taylor's National Patriotic Front of Liberia and Ulimo fought each other in the Cape Mount area west of the capital, Monrovia. Some of an estimated 3,000 Liberians who fled the area said the two militias had confiscated all food supplies and civilians went in fear for their lives.
Zimbabwe govt to buy farms

_By Robin Drew_
Star Africa Service 13/1/92

HARARE — Thirteen farms in Zimbabwe, seven owned by whites and six black-owned properties, are to be acquired by the government in the eastern province of Mancalan to resettle families who will have to move when the lake fills behind the giant Osborne Dam currently under construction.

The farms are the first to be designated for acquisition by the government under the controversial law which came into force in May despite strenuous objections.

The government has given repeated assurances that productive farms will not be taken for resettlement.

However, several of the designated farms are highly productive, an official of the farmers' union said yesterday.

Commercial Farmers' Union director David Hasluck said the union had been given notice of the action. He had not yet been able to contact the affected farmers, but approaches would be made to government officials.

The notices in the Government Gazette, inviting the owners who object to the bid to take over their properties to do so by August 10, were signed by the former Minister of Agriculture, Dr Witness Mangwende.

A government-appointed compensation committee will decide what compensation should be paid for properties acquired under the Act.

The farms earmarked for resettlement cover nearly 8,000 ha. According to a report 200 families will need to be resettled.

Democracy worth dying for activist

LUSAKA — Freed opposition leader Chakufwa Chihana said yesterday he would continue campaigning for democracy in Malawi even if it meant a death sentence for sedition.

"Many people have died for democracy in this country, why should I be spared?" he said.

"My death will hasten the demise of the one-party state."

Mr Chihana (52), head of the opposition Democratic Alliance, was released on bail on Saturday after being held for three months without charge.

He was arrested on April 6 when he returned home from a conference in Zambia at which he called for a pro-democracy congress in Malawi.

The Malawi government has been widely accused of human rights abuses, including the torture, detention and assassination of its opponents.

Speaking from his attorney's home in Blantyre, Mr Chihana said he was kept in solitary confinement and denied reading material in prison.

He was locked into leg irons for more than a month and repeatedly interrogated, he said.

"I heard no news from the outside world," Mr Chihana said. "Being in prison is like being sealed in a bottle. You hear nothing."

In May, at least 22 people were killed in riots touched off by the government's failure to bring Mr Chihana to court.

Judge James Kaliane granted Mr Chihana bail of $2,500 (about R7,000) on Friday and ordered him to appear in court today in the former capital of Zambia, where he is expected to be formally charged with sedition.

Mr Chihana said President Kamuzu Banda's government was "in tatters" and had failed to suppress demands for political reforms in recent months.

"There is no way it can be resuscitated or reformed," he said. "Democratic change is the only alternative."

Dr Banda, who led the former British colony to independence in 1964, outlawed political opposition and declared himself president for life. Believed to be in his 90s, he has said that his nation of 8 million people supported one-party rule.

But it has shown signs of acceding to Western pressure for democratic reforms and an end to the alleged human rights abuses.

Western nations last month froze $74 million (about R210 million) in aid to Malawi to press for reforms.

The government has released 18 detainees and says the International Red Cross will be allowed to visit prisons next month for the first time in two decades.

Among 10 detainees released on Friday was Aleke Banda, a former Cabinet minister held without trial for 12 years. He is no relation to the president.

Court charges freed Malawian activist on 3 counts of sedition

LUSAKA — A Malawi magistrate's court yesterday charged pro-democracy campaigner Chakufwa Chihana with three counts related to sedition, his lawyer Bazuka Mhango said.

Mr Mhango said the case had been referred to the high court for trial at a date to be announced later.

"He has been charged with offences relating to sedition: the first one of importing seditious publications, secondly being found in possession of seditious publications and thirdly preparing an act with seditious intent," Mr Mhango said in a telephone interview from Lilongwe.

He said the penalty was a fine equivalent to about R2,150 or a five-year prison sentence.

"We have to see what evidence they come up with to support the charges but our stand has always been that there is no offence," he said, adding that hundreds of people had gathered outside the court chanting support for Mr Chihana.

Mr Chihana, chairman of the Lusaka-based Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance, was arrested on April 6 on his return to Malawi from talks with pro-democracy exiles in Zambia and South Africa.

He was freed on Saturday after a high court judge granted him bail, the first in Malawi's history of political detentions.

Mr Chihana (22) was freed on condition that he surrenders his passport and reports to the police once a week. Two Malawians put up bail of about R3,000.

Banda awaits history’s verdict

MACHFISA Munthali is a Malawian but he has at least one thing in common with Nelson Mandela - 27 years altogether. Unlike the ANC leader, who spent the last part of his detention in a comfortable house in the prison grounds, Mr Munthali spent his final years in a cell one metre wide and two metres high. That is what he says anyway, and since we have no means of measuring the cell but no reason to doubt his word, for one, accept it.

Mr Munthali was imprisoned in 1963 by President Kamuzu Banda for alleged treason. In Malawian that can be a euphemism for any attempt to promote political freedom or to challenge Dr Banda's suppression of it. Since Mr Munthali was jailed without trial he must be presumed to have been innocent.

Dr Banda may not realise it, but history will judge him not only by his own professed achievements but also by actions such as locking an innocent man in a cell the size of a lavatory.

Mr Munthali was one of several political prisoners released recently in what appears to have been an effort to appease Western donors, who have begun cutting off Malawi's foreign aid.

The freeing of the prisoners is one of several concessions Dr Banda's government has made in response to growing internal as well as external opposition.

More concessions can be expected and one that I look forward to is freedom for the press to report without hindrance on events in Malawi.

Dr Banda's government maintains that this freedom has existed for a long time. Well, it certainly didn't exist when the government kept harassing the local correspondents of The Star's Africa News Service over a period of some years. At least one of them was jailed without trial for doing nothing more than straightforward reporting.

The Africa Service tested the waters again recently when it was allowed to send a reporter to Malawi not long after the rioting in Blantyre. The reporter, Hans-Peter Bakker, was not prevented from going anywhere but he did find himself often in the company of officials of the Ministry of Information, whether he liked it or not.

One of these worthies told Mr Bakker, during ceremonies in the Blantyre stadium to mark President Banda's birthday: "I will tell you when it is not necessary to take photographs." Just when it became "unnecessary" to take photographs was communicated to Mr Bakker by his being seized by the scruff of the neck and jerked violently away.

Mr Bakker assumed that he had either got closer to the president than journalists are allowed to get or he had taken photographs outside of the period designated for picture-taking.

At one point he was told by an official: "If you don't stop, taking photographs now we will stop you permanently."

Later, at a garden party at the presidential residence Sanjika Palace, Mr Bakker got within a few metres of Dr Banda to take pictures but then was told by an official: "If you don't toe the line I will take away your film." That wasn't as bad as being stopped permanently but it was enough to still Mr Bakker's shutter again.

Before Mr Bakker went to Malawi, the Africa Service had given officials an assurance that he would report factually and objectively on the situation there and as far as the Africa Service is concerned that is what he did.

But this assessment was not shared in Sanjika Palace. After his articles had appeared in South Africa he was telephoned by the principal secretary in the Ministry of Information and Tourism and told that a "low opinion had been formed of him."

"Don't bother to try to come back to Malawi," he was told.

Is this goodbye from the warm heart?
HARARE — Malawian dissident Chakufwa Chihana was arrested again and a US trade union official monitoring his case was deported by Malawi's government.

The unionist, Thomas Medley, said Chihana was detained yesterday, just three days after being freed on bail following three months behind bars.

On the same day, Medley, regional representative of the African American Labour Centre, received deportation papers.

Lilongwe police had told Chihana's wife he was to be taken to Zomba, where he had been jailed for the past three months.

He has not been heard from since.

Malawi dissident Chihana held again

HARARE. — Malawi dissident Mr Chakufwa Chihana has been arrested again and an American trade union official monitoring his case has been deported in an apparent crackdown.

The union official, Mr Thomas Medley, said yesterday Mr Chihana had been detained on Tuesday, just three days after being freed on bail following three months behind bars.

Later the same day, Mr Medley, regional representative of the Washington-based African American Labour Centre (AALC), was served with deportation papers advising him that he had been declared a prohibited immigrant.

"Are they attempting to hide something now?" asked Mr Medley, who said he had been allowed to travel freely to Malawi since Mr Chihana's arrest on sedition charges on April 6.

Mr Chihana's lawyer, Mr Bazuka Mahango, said police in the capital, Lilongwe, had told the dissident's wife they had orders that he be taken to Zomba, where he had been held previously.

He was arrested when reporting to the police in compliance with his bail conditions and had not been heard from since.

Mr Chihana, 52, leader of the opposition Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance, was first arrested when he returned to Malawi in April, saying he would press for reform in the one-party state.

Mr Medley said he had been monitoring the case as his organisation had links with the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Council, of which Mr Chihana is secretary-general.

Mr Medley believed he had been declared a prohibited immigrant "because of my stand on trade union, political and human rights".

He said his Washington office was making representations to the United States State Department and the Malawi government.

A recent pledge that Mr Chihana would be granted a fair trial and his release on bail had been interpreted as a sign that Malawi's life-president, Dr Kamuzu Banda, was bowing to internal and international pressure to introduce political reforms.

A date has yet to be set for the High Court trial, where Mr Chihana faces a maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment on charges relating to the possession of seditious publications. — Sapa-AFP

Harry Chiume said he had confirmation that Chihana had been remanded by police on Tuesday after his release on Saturday, but attempts to see him had been unsuccessful.

Northern Lesotho to have super ski and casino resort

CONSTRUCTION of a Lesotho ski resort would begin before the end of the year, Lesotho Holdings & Development MD Andre Bruyns said at the project’s launch yesterday.

The ski resort would be part of a R63bn casino, golf course and hotel development in northern Lesotho, part of a joint venture by a consortium of SA businessmen together with the Lesotho National Development Corporation, he said.

Bruyns said most of the capital generated for the project would be coming from European investors and would provide a major injection of foreign capital into the country.

A mountain pass near the resort site would be suitable for the creation of a ski piste, Bruyns said.

Research into the area’s temperature has shown that artificial snow could be produced on a small scale “without too much trouble”, Bruyns said.

Machines had been developed in Europe which were capable of producing artificial snow at much lower temperatures than had been the case only a few years ago, Bruyns said.

“With a temperature of around two degrees Celsius you can make artificial snow,” he said.

Lesotho Trade and Industries Minister Molelulane Mokorona said the construction of the resort, which will be called Eagle Rock, would be the start of an aggressive tourism development programme in Lesotho.

“The programme is in part a result of the infrastructure which now exists following the implementation of the R63bn Lesotho Highlands Water Scheme,” he said.

Parts of Lesotho, particularly the scenic mountain areas, which could only be reached by helicopter before completion of the Highlands water scheme, were now accessible by road, he said.

The Eagle Rock project, which has been in the planning stages for two years, is expected to take up to 22 months to complete.

Provisional tenders have already been submitted.

It is hoped clients from many parts of SA will be attracted to the 200-room hotel, ski piste, casino and restaurant complex.

Also included in the resort will be theme bars, an 18-hole championship golf course and a number of other sporting facilities.

Lesotho National Development Corporation MD A M Monyake said a series of resorts had been planned.

These were aimed at creating “major job opportunities for Lesotho”, said the minister.
1988 township killing: policemen suspected

By Guy Jepson

Police are investigating a murder case against three current and two former municipal policemen in connection with the killing of a Daveyton resident nearly four years ago.

The murder of Aaron Moshokoa may never have been discovered without a tip-off.

An inquest court found that he had died of natural causes in September 1988.

Acting on information received, investigators subsequently established that he had been murdered, said SAP spokesman Captain Eugene Opperman.

"Mr Moshokoa was a private citizen. He was apparently picked up as a suspect on September 26, 1988. His body was found the next morning in Tiokwa Street, Daveyton.

"On February 22, 1988 an official inquest found that he had died of natural causes.

"Police received certain information and after investigations were completed, cases were opened against three members of the Daveyton municipal police and two ex-members."

Captain Opperman said on Wednesday that two of the three municipal policemen under investigation had been suspended from the force. The two former municipal policemen had previously resigned from the force.

The cases against the five men had been referred to the Attorney-General for a decision.

Legal access to Malawian activist denied

Mr Chihana was arrested on April 6 when he returned to Malawi. He was released last Saturday and on Monday was committed for trial on charges involving seditious documents. On Tuesday he was again taken into custody.

Fired pair join St Lucia campaign

Dr Ian Player and Dr Nolly Zaloumis, recently dropped from the Natal Parks Board, have joined the Campaign for St Lucia.

In a special meeting of the campaign, Dr Zaloumis was elected as the new chairman of the year-old campaign and Dr Player agreed to join the board of patrons.

Outgoing chairman Oliff d'Oliveira said he was disappointed that Natal Administrator Con Botha saw fit to remove "two champions of enlightened environmental conservation". "If this is intended to thwart the campaign and to smother the voices of Dr Player and Dr Zaloumis, it will not work."

Mr d'Oliveira's future role in the campaign would be to focus on the Wetland Conservation Bill, which is being supported by the ANC, CP, DP, members of the House of Delegates and individual NF MPs.

At the meeting, members welcomed new Parks Board chairman Pat Gosse's statement that the board was opposed to the mining of the eastern shores.
Amnesty campaigns for Chihana’s release

Amnesty International is calling urgently for information on re-arrested Malawian trade unionist.

By MELINDA HAM

The London-based human rights group Amnesty International has launched an Urgent Action campaign expressing their grave concern about the re-arrest of Malawian trade union leader Chaluwa Chihana this week.

The appeal says Amnesty International has “grave fears for Chukufwa Chihana’s safety” adding that Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda had threatened that returning dissidents would be “meat for crocodiles”. The international human rights group has already documented a number of political killings by the Malawian security forces.

In the present climate of rising support for political change, the appeal said “Elements of the security forces appear to be organising semi-official paramilitary groups and there are fears they may resort to extra-judicial executions.”

Amnesty is calling urgently for information from the Banda regime about Chihana’s whereabouts, and for his immediate and unconditional release with assurances that the Malawi government will guarantee his safety.

Chihana (52), the secretary general of the Southern Africa Trade Union Co-ordinating Council, disappeared on Tuesday at two in the afternoon after he reported to police headquarters in Mikuyu prison.

The trade union leader was granted bail on July 10 by a Lilongwe High Court judge and was finally released on Saturday after two of his friends had provided the $2,500 bail required, he had surrendered his passport and promised to report weekly to the police.

The months in detention seemed not to have weakened Chihana’s fighting spirit but strengthened it “I have returned to face a government that is in tatters. There is no way it can be resuscitated or reformed. Democratic change is the only alternative.”

Chihana said he was not frightened to speak out in favour of democracy “Many people have died for democracy in this country. Why should I be spared?” If they want to kill me for what I am saying let them go ahead... My death will hasten the demise of the one party state.”

The pro-democracy activist was not charged until three days later when he appeared in a magistrates court in Zomba and was welcomed by a crowd of hundreds of supporters who cheered “Keep on going, Chihana.” He was charged on three accounts of possession of unlawful material, importing seditious material into Malawi and preparing to act with seditious intent.

Political analysts are now trying to speculate why Chihana was re-arrested. One western diplomat said his appearance at the Zomba magistrate’s court was “a little too presidential for the government’s liking” and could fuel further opposition within the country.
Malawian dissident defiant

THE MALAWIAN pro-democracy campaigner, Chakufwa Chihana, weakened by malaria and ill-treatment after three months in prison, said he would continue to defy President Hastings Banda's government, even if it meant his death.

"Many people have died in the struggle for democracy in Malawi, so why should I be spared?" the trade unionist said from his lawyer's office in Blantyre. "If they want to kill me for what I'm saying, let them go ahead. My death will only oil the engine of democracy and hasten the demise of the one-party state."

Mr Chihana, aged 52, is secretary-general of the Southern Africa Trade Union Co-ordination Council and chairman of the interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance. He was arrested on April 6 after returning to Malawi from a democracy conference in Zambia. He was freed on bail by the high court on Saturday.

Mr Chihana said he had been held in solitary confinement in leg irons for more than a month and his feet had swollen. "It was very demoralising to hear the wailing of other prisoners, crying out to God," he said.

He described prison food as unfit for human consumption and said he had been denied reading materials, even a Bible. He was unconcerned that his public statements might jeopardise his coming trial.

500 kids starved to death

MORE than 500 children have starved to death in the southern part of Malawi since May and 8 000 more are at risk because of a severe food shortage.

Malawi — hit by the worst drought in living memory — requires 55 000 tons of maize every month to cover the country’s 24 districts.

Starvation threatens thousands of peasants, particularly in the Chikwawa and Nsanje districts in the Lower Shire area. Social workers say up to 8 000 children under the age of five are in serious trouble in this area alone.

Malawi now has a shortfall of 800 000 tons of maize and the pledges it has received so far from donors are inadequate for its drought relief requirements, says Drought Relief Committee chairman Dr Graham Chipande.

Plan to form a transitional government:

LUSAKA - Twenty leading political dissidents will return to Malawi to organise a convention on reform and the formation of a broad-based transitional government, an exiled opposition leader said this week.

Mr. George Kanyanya, chairman of the Lusaka-based United Front for Multi-Party Democracy in Malawi, told a news conference on Tuesday that the leadership and affiliates decided to return home at a meeting held last weekend.

"We unanimously resolved that 20 of us should return to Malawi within four to eight weeks' time to organise a national democratic convention that will resolve the current debilitating political impasse and pave way for a broad-based transitional government," he said. - Sapa-AFP.
Despite recent ructions, President-for-life Hastings Banda maintains a firm grip on power

ONCR upon a time there was an actual species of tropical algae. In the late 1970s, aquariums began putting it in their aquariums. Cadmium thallus had everything going for it: growth, form like foliages, fronds, and an amazing capacity to reproduce. As a result, it became a staple in both home and public aquariums. In 1984, taxidi, algae was spotted in the waters of the Mediterranean Sea. It was soon found that the algae was growing in the wild at a rapid pace.

This algal bloom, known as 'bloom', caused concern among aquarists and marine biologists. The algae is a type of diatom, a single-celled organism that plays a crucial role in the marine food web. The blooms can lead to oxygen depletion, which can negatively impact fish and other marine life.

The algae has also been linked to a condition known as 'algal bloom', which occurs when certain types of algae grow rapidly, depleting the water of oxygen. This can lead to the death of fish and other marine organisms.

In recent years, concern over the impact of these blooms has grown, particularly in areas where tourism and fishing are major industries. Malawi dissident case judgment is reserved

HARARE - Malawi dissident Mr Chakuwa Chihana remained in jail yesterday after a High Court judge reserved judgment on an appeal for his release.

Chihana's lawyer Mr Bazuka Mahango said from Lilongwe by telephone that he expected a ruling next week.

He said the state had argued that Chihana should be kept in custody until his trial on sedition charges was concluded "because he might commit further offences by expressing his opinion" on political issues in interviews with international media.

The defence had charged that Chihana's arrest last month after just three days on bail was unlawful and violated constitutional rights.

Chihana, leader of the opposition Interim Committee for a Democratic Alliance, was first arrested in April when he pledged to campaign for multi-party democracy in the southern African country on his return from a meeting of exiles in Zambia.

Three months later, after international pressure for his release, the 52-year-old trade unionist was granted bail on charges of sedition.

Interviewed by international radio stations after being freed, he said he would continue to campaign for political reform, and was then rearrested.

Chihana was not in court for the hearing yesterday. No date has been set for his trial - Sapa-AFP.

Malawian church leaders detained

LUSAKA — In a new crackdown on dissent, Malawian police detained 11 church leaders and outlawed a pro-democracy rally yesterday, a church leader said.

Ten of the clergy were released yesterday evening, and it was not known whether they would face charges, said the Rev Aaron Longwe, moderator-elect of the Church of Central African Presbyterians. The fate of the 11th prisoner was not known.

Publicise

"These detentions are a very sad development," Mr Longwe said.

Mr Longwe was one of the organizers of the rally planned for the northern city of Mzuzu. Church leaders said it was intended to publicise their calls for a national referendum on ending one-party rule.

But police swooped down on the organizers late on Saturday and detained nine, including a Roman Catholic priest, Father John Leahey from Ireland, Mr Longwe said.

Two more were arrested yesterday, including one priest who urged his congregation to defy the government and attend the rally. All except that priest had been freed by yesterday evening, according to Mr Longwe and a lawyer, Harry Chumane.

State radio said on Saturday night the rally had been banned because of security regulations.

Religious leaders and human rights groups, including Amnesty International, have accused President Kamuzu Banda of allowing human rights violations. They have detailed allegations that political opponents have been assassinated, detained without trial and hounded into exile.

Dr Banda, who led Malawi to independence in 1964, has rejected such charges.

He has also resisted pressure to end one-party rule, saying Malawians favour it.

In May, Western donors suspended aid until "tangible and irreversible" political reforms were introduced.

Erupted

The country is badly strapped for money due to drought and the responsibility of caring for 1 million war refugees from neighbouring Mozambique.

Public dissatisfaction erupted in anti-government riots in May, and at least 22 people were killed. Since then, the government has freed some political prisoners and relaxed the law that permitted detention without charge — Sapa-AP
Priest rearrested, deported from Malawi

LUSAKA — Malawi authorities yesterday deported a Roman Catholic priest a few hours after he was arrested together with a local Protestant priest who had planned to organise an anti-government rally last Sunday.

Workers at the Saint Peter's Church, in the northern town of Mzuzu, said Father Thomas Leahy was brought by police, two hours after his arrest with the Rev. Aaron Longwe, to bid farewell to his congregation and colleagues.

"The police brought him around to come and say good-bye to us and he was immediately driven to Lilongwe, from where they said he will fly straight to Ireland," said his cook, who identified himself only as Mphande.

Mr. Leahy had told the people who gathered at the parish that he had received a deportation order because of his involvement with a Presbyterian Church of Scotland rally, said another church employee named only as Mrs. Hara.

Father Leahy was rearrested yesterday morning after Mzuzu police released him with nine others on Sunday for planning to hold a rally at his parish grounds.

The rally, which failed to take place because of the arrests and police intervention, was organised by Mr. Longwe, who has since been detained without charge and is expected to be transferred to Lilongwe.

In April, the government deported another Irish-born Catholic cleric, Monsignor John Roche, who was a signatory to a pastoral letter which criticised Malawi's human rights record and called for improved basic freedoms.

LONDON — Police have arrested hundreds of people in Malawi since May in a government crackdown on an unprecedented upsurge of opposition dubbed the “Fax Revolution”, Amnesty International has said.

There was also “a frightening pattern of deaths in custody”, the human rights watchdog said last week in a report on repression in Malawi.

Police raided offices and homes seeking opponents of the single-party rule of President Kamuzu Banda, in some cases, as at the National Bank of Malawi’s computer section, arresting the entire staff on suspicion of using photocopiers to reprint multi-party literature.

Anyone with a fax machine can face police harassment on the grounds it had been used to send anti-government messages.

“The government is facing unexpected opposition and it is reacting with repression,” the report said, calling on Malawi to halt human rights abuses.

“We have reports of 285 people being crammed into one small cell, of people being kept in leg irons, of severe beatings and electric shocks. One woman had been stripped naked and tortured with an electric cattle prod,” it said.

Malawi, ruled by Dr Banda with an iron fist since independence from Britain in 1964, has seen an unprecedented rise in political protest since the country’s Roman Catholic bishops issued a challenge to the government in March, in a letter read out in churches nationwide.

In the letter, of which 16,000 copies were printed, the bishops criticised Malawi’s human rights record and called for greater democracy. The letter was declared seditious, making it an offence to have a copy. The Catholic bishops were later backed by Protestant church leaders as well as Western creditor nations, which have withheld non-humanitarian aid until the government improves its human rights record — Sapa-AFP.
Russia and US uranium deal blow for SA

WASHINGTON — A United States decision to buy 50 tons of highly enriched weapons-grade uranium from Russia over the next five years is likely to come as a blow to smaller uranium producers such as South Africa and Canada.

The United States will dilute the uranium and sell it as commercial reactor fuel, President Bush has announced. A further 30 tons would be similarly transferred and sold after that, he added.

The deal is expected to flood the United States market with cheap enriched uranium fuel for decades to come.

The US-Russian agreement is said to have been aimed in part at preventing the material — removed from nuclear weapons now being dismantled — from falling into the wrong hands.

Some of the profits from the sale of the Russian fuel, Mr. Bush announced, would be used to improve the safety of nuclear power stations in the former Soviet Union.

Many are believed to need urgent attention and at least six, built to the same design and at the same time as the Chernobyl reactor, are regarded by some Western scientists as dangerous.

While the agreement, installed in Moscow and subject to formal ratification within 12 months, appears to limit the sale of the diluted fuel to commercial users in the United States, there is no clarity on the matter.

Some observers suggest that pressure from Russia for foreign exchange could encourage the sale of the commercial fuel internationally.

There is no indication yet what reaction the agreement is likely to get from the US Senate, which would have to ratify any formal treaty, but senators of both major parties have expressed concern about the risks involved in the nuclear disarmament of the former Soviet Union — so the agreement may well be encouraged and quickly endorsed.

SVETI STEFAN (Yugoslavia) — Reclusive US chess star Bobby Fischer has made a triumphant comeback, beating old rival Boris Spassky in a match he agreed to play in Yugoslavia in open defiance of UN sanctions.

Fischer, 48, emerged from 20 years self-imposed seclusion to beat Spassky in six hours and 49 moves yesterday in the first game of a $5 million (about £13 million) re-match of their legendary 1972 world championship duel.

"I had a good opening advantage, and basically that was it," Fischer, a confident Fischer told reporters after the game.

"It was a pretty good game," Spassky, robbed by Fischer of the world crown in their 1972 Reykjavic encounter amid allegations of cheating and even spying, was generous in defeat.

"I think I missed the best plan. Bobby had a nice line and eventually I was killed," Spassky said to a guffaw of laughter from Fischer.

LONDON. — Malawi’s ageing President Kamuzu Banda is attempting to suppress burgeoning opposition with mass arrests, raids on offices and homes and church harassment, says Amnesty International.

The London-based human rights organisation said that hundreds of people had been arrested in the past four months and crammed into overcrowded prison cells, some deliberately flooded with excrement.

Ill-treatment included forcing political prisoners to clear up excrement with their bare hands, the report said.

"The government is facing unexpected opposition and it is reacting with repression," said Amnesty International.

"We have reports of 255 people being crammed into one small cell, of people being kept up to 10 nights in cells, of severe beatings and electric shocks." There is also a frightening pattern of deaths in custody.

President Banda, believed to be in his 90s, has ruled this central African nation since independence from Britain in 1964.

He presides over a one-party state as president-for-life and is resisting post-Cold War pressure on Third World dictatorships to hold multiparty elections.

The crackdown followed a Lenten pastoral letter in March by Malawi’s Roman Catholics criticising the government and calling for greater democracy. The letter sparked public debate, including anti-government demonstrations.

A bishop, Irsh Monsignor John Roche, was expelled and others threatened with execution by ruling Malawi Congress Party leaders.

In its report, Amnesty International said that since May police had swooped on homes and offices, sometimes simply on suspicion that a photocopier was used to reproduce multiparty literature.

In separate raids the entire staffs, totalling about 30, of the computer sections of the National Bank of Malawi and of the Electricity Supply Commission were picked up, the report said.

The commission’s acting computer manager, Grey Nyenje, was feared to have been tortured and might have died in custody, it said.

"The government has taken some steps to improve respect for human rights — probably more than 60 political detainees have been released this year — but that is all undermined by these continuing arrests," said Amnesty International.

The Malawi High Commission in London did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

‘Repression and arrests in Malawi’
Editor returns under threat

Media criticism of Malawi elections:

GABORONE - A Malawian editor who received anonymous threats after being indirectly associated with foreign criticism of President Kamuzu Banda's government has returned to Malawi.

Mr. Amadu Osman, editor of the Financial Post in Blantyre, left Botswana, for Malawi on Wednesday. He received telephone threats while in Windhoek, Namibia, where he had been elected a member of the governing council of the Media Institute of Southern Africa.

At that meeting MISA adopted resolutions criticizing the Malawian government for restricting the news media and detaining people without trial.
Generals deny SAP helped Banda to quell protesters

Angry police generals have dismissed reports that senior South African Police members helped train Malawi's police force to crack down on pro-democracy protests.

The Weekly Mail reported that police were called in to help the Malawian police force because dictator Dr Kamuzu Banda believed his army could not be trusted to suppress pro-democracy demonstrations.

One of the policemen identified by the Weekly Mail was Lieutenant-General Basse Smit, head of the Crime Combating and Investigation section.

The newspaper said General Smit was an expert in counter-insurgency and political surveillance.

Annoyed police generals said there was absolutely no truth to claims that the SAP had helped Malawian police crack down on pro-democracy demonstrators.

"Lieutenant-General Smit is not an expert in counter-insurgency," one of his top colleagues said yesterday. "He has never even done a course in counter-insurgency," one of his top colleagues said yesterday. "He is an expert in the detective field, a professional detective, not a security officer."

Police generals said General Smit visited Malawi three times, staying for five days on each occasion, between February 1991 and January 1992. These visits were linked to 20 investigations into narcotics and the illegal sale of ivory, rhino horns and other game products.

In one case, 112 pieces of ivory horn were seized and a major in the Malawian army was arrested.
Bishops concerned over abuses in Malawi.

MALAWI's authorities have warned that a government crackdown on opposition activities has resulted in shocking human rights abuses. Amnesty International reported last week that reports of 285 people "being crammed into one small cell, of people being kept in leg irons, of severe beatings and electric shocks". One woman was stripped, beaten and pulled with an electric cord. The Malawi High Commissioner said the international Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was not allowed to visit the prison at the invitation of the government to look at prison conditions.

"One would have thought that the decent thing to do would have been to join forces with the ICRC or at least wait until the ICRC, who are in Malawi, made their findings public." The statement said Malawi would be happy to consider the recommendations of the ICRC. The Amnesty report said in response to international criticism, Malawi recently freed 10 political detainees, including a man held for 27 years. But active detainees were still imprisoned without charge or subjected to torture. Western donors suspended non-humanitarian aid to Malawi in May, demanding improved human rights and the introduction of a multi-party system. Banda’s weapon loses edge

For the first time since independence, an opposition group has been formed inside Malawi to press for political reform, reports BARNEY MTHOMBOTHI of The Star Africa Service in Lusaka

Chakufwa Chihana, a persistent opponent of the Banda regime, who is currently facing sedition charges

When a day passed after the announcement of the group’s formation without any action or response from the Malawian government, the opposition saw this as a sign of hope.

“It’s very surprising,” says Mr Chipeza. “We spoke to all the people (members of the group in Malawi) They have not been questioned or arrested. The government’s silence will give impetus or encouragement to our people in Malawi. It will show to them that there are people inside Malawi who are prepared to say ‘enough is enough’.”

This has been a difficult year for President Banda’s regime. Opposition to his government became evident in the country at the end of last year and early this year when anti-government literature began appearing in public for the first time. The authorities responded by rounding up and detaining suspects. Some of the detainees were allegedly tortured by security forces. This led to the historic pastoral letter from the Catholic Church which was highly critical of government conduct. The letter also appealed to the authorities to open up the political system.

The release of the pastoral letter coincided with a seminar in Lusaka which was attended for the first time by Malawians from inside and outside the country. Mr Chipeza, that meeting did not live up to expectations.

“Some outsiders felt threatened by the insiders. They felt the insiders had come to steal their show.”

Despite this, however, the meeting was extensively covered by the international media, and this incensed the Malawian government. It elicited the now-famous response by the government that anyone who dared to set foot in Malawi would “become meat for the crocodiles.”

The meeting decided that Mr Chihana would go back to Malawi to create a structure that would eventually organise a constitutional conference similar to those in several African countries. Mr Chihana was arrested on arrival in Malawi.

The situation in Malawi became confused as riots erupted in many parts of the country. Many people were detained. Donor nations responded by suspending aid to Malawi until the government introduced political reform.

According to the opposition, the government has quietly introduced unheralded changes which, even though minor, are regarded as significant.

The Forfeture Act, for instance, which empowers the government to seize property belonging to its political opponents, has been amended. Some political detainees have been released, a tribunal has been set up to review detainees’ cases, and censorship laws have been relaxed.

“All these reforms are the tip of the iceberg,” Mr Chipeza says.

The government’s silence will give impetus or encouragement to our people in Malawi. It will show to them that there are people inside Malawi who are prepared to say ‘enough is enough’

Mapopa Chipeta, a Malawian opposition activist based in Zambia

UZAFA - The most effective weapon Malawian dictator Kamuzu Banda has used to suppress dissent all these years is fear.

But when workers noted in many parts of Malawi earlier this year forcing the authorities to use heavy-handed methods to quell the uprisings, the message was clear: the people of Malawi have at last overcome the fear that had frozen them for almost three decades.

“The government (of president Banda) should realise it’s in a no-win situation,” says Mapopa Chipeta, a Malawian opposition activist based in Zambia.

Dr Banda cannot afford to sit still because his people and most importantly the international donors want change. But change will almost certainly seem too powerful.

“There is a lot of defiance throughout the country,” Chipeta adds.

This defiance has emboldened Banda’s opponents to take a risk which would never have entered the realm of speculation only a few months ago. A pressure group was formed inside Malawi this week to campaign openly through peaceful means for democratic reform.

To be known as the Alliance for Democracy (AFORD), the group comprises some well-known Malawians and is led by trade unionist Chakufwa Chihana, a persistent opponent of the Banda regime, who is currently facing sedition charges.

When a day passed after the announcement of the group’s formation without any action or response from the Malawian government, the opposition saw this as a sign of hope.

“We spoke to all the people (members of the group in Malawi) They have not been questioned or arrested.

“The government’s silence will give impetus or encouragement to our people in Malawi. It will show to them that there are people inside Malawi who are prepared to say ‘enough is enough’.

“Thus has been a difficult year for President Banda’s regime. Opposition to his government became evident within the country towards the end of last year and early this year when anti-government literature began appearing in public for the first time.

“The authorities responded by rounding up and detaining many suspects. Some of the detainees were allegedly tortured by security forces.

“This led to a historic pastoral letter from the Catholic Church which was highly critical of government conduct. The letter also appealed to the authorities to open up the political system.

“The release of the pastoral letter coincided with a seminar in Lusaka which was attended for the first time by Malawians from inside and outside the country.

“But according to Chipeta that meeting did not live up to expectation. He blames this on what he calls power-play and personality clashes.

“Some ‘outsiders’ felt threatened by the ‘insiders’. They felt the insiders had come to steal their show.”

Despite this, however, the meeting was extensively covered by the international media, and this increased the Malawian government. It elicited the now-famous response by the government that anyone who dared to set foot in Malawi would “become meat for the crocodiles.”

The meeting decided that Chihana would go back to Malawi to create a structure that would eventually organise a constitutional conference similar to those that have taken place in several African countries. Chihana was arrested on arrival in Malawi.

The situation in Malawi became confused as riots erupted in many parts of the country. The causes were varied, but it seems industrial issues and the failure by the authorities to control Chihana in court, where he was due to appear, provoked the spark.

Many people were detained. Donor nations responded by suspending aid to Malawi until the government introduced political reform.

According to the opposition, the government has quietly introduced unheralded changes, which even though minor are regarded as significant.

The Forfeiture Act, for instance, which empowers the government to seize property belonging to its political opponents has been amended, some political detainees have been released, a tribunal has been set up to review detainees’ cases and censorship laws have been relaxed.

“All these reforms are too little, too late,” Chipeta says.

“But given the fact that the regime has been in power for 24 years, it is quite significant that it is responding. That symbolism is important.”

The opposition strategy, he says, is to campaign inside the country and to isolate the country internationally. Although they are reluctant to talk about it, the opposition have also been in touch with the South African government. Malawi’s strongest ally.

They say they have noticed a cooling of relations between the two countries.

“It’s no longer business as usual,” Chipeta says.

He says South Africa has been putting out feelers to the Malawian opposition as it realises Banda’s days are numbered.

However, according to a confidential World Bank document, the South African government has extended to Malawi a concessional credit of R6 075 million at a generous 4.5 per cent interest per annum to make up for the 1992 balance of payment financial gap occasioned by donor countries’ decision to suspend aid to Malawi.

“All we want is the introduction of multi-party democracy in Malawi,” Chipeta says.

“It’s not for us to say whether Banda should step down or not. If people say Banda should be retained, well and good. It’s the system we’re fighting. People should be allowed to choose.”

Rise in insurance complaints noted

A RISE in the number of complaints to the short-term insurance industry ombudsman is not linked to the difficult period in which the industry finds itself, says Ombudsman Bill Schreiner.

Reviewing his role for the year to March 1992, Schreiner said the number of cases his office took up rose 73% to 599 from 347 last year.

"I doubt the rise is connected to the difficult period through which the industry is passing, and a subconscious tendency among insurers to look for reasons to repudiate claims," Schreiner said.

The increase was probably due to the public's increased awareness of their ability to complain.

However, he warned dissatisfied claimants that neither his office nor the media should be used as a lever to persuade an insurer to a favourable decision.

Schreiner also criticised the small number of insurance companies that refused to negotiate in good faith, and closed their files on cases in dispute.

"We can only act as a mediator where there are two parties to a negotiation. So, where a small minority of insurers refuse to participate, I can do little," he said.

Of the 599 cases his office handled during the year, less than 30% had led to a decision in favour of the insured person.

"This is not out of the ordinary. In the Ombudsman Bureau in London there was a finding in favour of the insured in around 30% of the cases undertaken last year," Schreiner said.

Malawian democrats seek SA aid

BILLY PADDOCK

Exiled Malawian Democratic Party leader Kamlepo Kalua is trying to persuade South African businessmen to lobby President Kamuzu Banda and democrats in Malawi.

In a statement yesterday, Kalua, who with other party members fled Malawi after the detention of opposition leaders, said repression under Banda was reminiscent of the abuses of former Ugandan president Idi Amin.

His party's aim was to institute multiparty democracy.

"We want free and fair elections. We want a government which is accountable to the people. We want an economic system where there are opportunities for all and where market forces will bring growth and create wealth for all," he said.

He called on the business community in general and "those dealing with Malawi in particular, to apply pressure on the Banda government".

He said the threat by Banda that opponents to the government in Malawi would become "meat for the crocodiles" indicated that elections would not be held without severe pressure being applied.
Priests back democracy call

Anglicans favour just society

Sowetan Africa News Service

GABORONE - The Anglican bishops of Central Africa have given tacit support to demands for democracy in Malawi in a statement issued after a five-day visit to that country.

The statement by the bishops of Botswana, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe is one of the strongest expressions of opposition to the autocratic, one-party rule of President Kamuzu Banda that has yet come from the churches.

The bishops said they had noted that "an irrevocable movement for change", aimed at creating "a more democratic and just society", had begun in Malawi.
Kill the bishops,
urge Malawi MPs

LONDON — Leading members of Malawi's ruling party have been tape-recording their denunciations of the government and its human rights record. The tapes were released in response to the disappearance of several bishops who had been critical of the regime. The tapes contain chilling accusations of torture and murder, and they raise serious questions about the safety of those involved. The tapes have been broadcast widely, and they have caused a significant increase in public awareness of human rights violations.

The tapes have been made public by the Malawi Congress Party, and they were recorded in the presence of witnesses. The tapes include interviews with former presidents and members of the ruling party, as well as recordings of conversations between senior officials. The tapes are available online, and they are widely circulated.

The release of the tapes has sparked a debate about the role of the media in exposing human rights abuses. Some critics have argued that the tapes are being used to further political agendas, while others have praised them for their courage and commitment to justice. The tapes have also been criticized for being unverified and unauthenticated.

The government has denied any involvement in the disappearances of the bishops, and it has responded to the release of the tapes with official statements. However, many Malawians are skeptical of these claims, and they believe that the tapes provide solid evidence of the regime's human rights violations.

The release of the tapes has also been met with international condemnation. Human rights organizations have called for a full investigation into the disappearances of the bishops, and they have urged the Malawian government to take responsibility for the human rights abuses.

The tapes have sparked a renewed interest in human rights issues in Malawi, and they have raised important questions about the rule of law and the protection of human rights. The release of the tapes is a significant step in the fight for justice and accountability, and it is a reminder of the importance of media freedom and the role of the media in exposing human rights abuses.
Banda rules out change in Malawi

LILONGWE — President Kamuzu Banda has ruled out a multiparty system in Malawi, saying it was unsuitable and would cause corruption and strife.

"There is no question of multipartyism here," Banda, president for life of the central African nation, told a convention of his ruling Malawi Congress Party at the weekend.

Malawi would remain a one-party state whether the country's "friends or enemies like it or not," he said, according to the official Malawi News Agency.

Masire sees a chance for development

NEW YORK — Botswana has been surrounded by civil war and instability in southern Africa since its inception. Now its president sees hope for peace in the region, and with it a real chance for development.

President Festus Mogae came to New York to address the UN General Assembly. He flew in from Rome, where he witnessed the signing of a truce on Sunday by Mozambique government officials and members of the Renamo guerrilla group.

"It appeared people were seriously applying their minds to a solution to the problem," Masire told Associated Press on Monday. "Because, let's face it, to engage in a war for 17 years is quite exhausting, quite paralyzing."

Masire, who addressed the General Assembly yesterday, also pointed to Angola, which held its first multiparty elections last week as part of a peace accord that ended 16 years of civil war. Angola's President Jose Eduardo dos Santos and his ruling party appear to be winning as results trickle in. But Jonas Savimbi, the former rebel leader who is challenging dos Santos for the presidency, has levelled charges of fraud and said his backers could take up arms again if he does not win.

Masire said he was confident that one compelling consideration would force Savimbi to accept the election results, even if he lost.

"They are all in search of peace. Elections are the best single thing that can bring peace to the country."

Masire said he was encouraged by developments in SA where, after a four-month hiatus, the ANC last week agreed to resume talks with government.

"When we became independent, there was SA in Namibia, there were the Portuguese in Angola and Mozambique, and Zimbabwe was then Rhodesia," Masire said. "But the situation has changed to a large measure. Indeed, if democracy comes to SA, that would close a very gloomy period."

Botswana gained independence from Britain in 1966 and is considered one of the most politically and economically stable democracies in Africa.

With combatants in neighboring states all coming to the negotiating table and the ballot box, Botswana would no longer have to be militarily ready for a spillover of the fighting, or cope with refugees.

Masire said he also envisioned new economic co-operation in Africa along the lines of the EC, spurred on by SA's economic engine. — Saps-AP.

Crowd rallies behind activist

HARARE — The Malawi pro-democracy activist, Mr Chakufwa Chihana, discharged yesterday on two of five counts of sedition, addressed big crowds outside the Blantyre High Court after the afternoon's proceedings.

The chanting crowd, estimated by his lawyer, Mr Ezuka Mahango, to number between 35,000 to 45,000, sang songs of praise for Mr Chihana.

He told the people to avoid violence and destruction of property and to continue supporting the Alliance for Democracy, which he had been chosen to lead.

People braved rains, Mr Mahango said, and formed a procession behind Mr Chihana's car from the court along the highway to Blantyre until they were stopped at gunpoint by Malawi's security forces. They dispersed peacefully.

The judge upheld Mr Chihana's application for appeal to the Supreme Court on the three outstanding charges relating to the importation and possession of seditious publications and breach of public security regulations.

The two counts dropped yesterday morning related to acts likely to have incited people against the Malawi government.

Mr Chihana has pleaded not guilty to all the sedition charges. If convicted, he faces up to five years in prison. — Saps-AFP supply resumes.
Malawian relief

HARARE - The movement of truck-borne relief supplies in Mozambique's Beira corridor, halted at the weekend by a new system of tariffs and vehicle limits, was expected to resume in the next few days after intervention by the Zimbabwe government. (7)

Transport Minister Denis Norman said yesterday Mozambique had agreed to accept the new toll of US$150 in the form of travelers' cheques, instead of cash, and to suspend new specifications which barred trucks heavier than 38 tons and longer than 18m.

Scores of trucks jammed the border post at Machipanda in Zimbabwe, the start of the 314km corridor when the regulations were introduced. None of the vehicles, carrying maize to avert a famine in Malawi, could pay the $150 cash toll. — Sapa.

Banda calls referendum

LUSAKA — Life President Kamuzu Banda of Malawi has succumbed to mounting international and domestic pressure and announced that a referendum is to be held on whether the country should change to a multiparty democracy after 30 years of one-party rule.

According to the official Malawi News Agency, the nonagenarian life president told a press conference in the capital, Lilongwe, that the date of the referendum had not been decided but it would be held "as soon as possible."

Since independence from Britain in 1964, Dr Banda and his Malawi Congress Party have ruled the country by ruthlessly suppressing all opposition and detaining political dissidents. In recent months the life president has come under increasing pressure from Western donors who have frozen aid amounting to R11.2 million until they see "tangible and irreversible change" — Telegraph.
Nigerian bank needs rescuing

LAGOS — National Bank of Nigeria, the country's oldest indigenous bank, had been declared insolvent and needed an injection of about two-billion naira ($102m) to keep it alive, official insurance body the Nigerian Deposit Insurance Corporation (NDIC) said yesterday.

"It is completely insolvent. We have given the owners a task force report," an NDIC spokesman said.

Banking sources said it was unlikely the cash would be found and the bank, in operation since the mid-'70s and owned by southern states, would probably close after two years in crisis.

The Central Bank of Nigeria took direct control of the bank in January because of its deteriorating financial condition and inability to meet depositors' demands.

A National Bank of Nigeria official quoted by the government-controlled weekly Business Times, told governors of the owner states the amount needed — enough to float 40 new banks — was unlikely to be forthcoming to resuscitate the "mysteriously insolvent" bank.

It was one of nine commercial banks which the NDIC classified as distressed in 1999, after seven in 1998.

There is a total of about 120 banks in Nigeria. — Sapa-Reuters.

Aid donors notch up victory in Malawi

HARARE— Western aid donors have notched up another victory in their campaign to link cash to human rights at the weekend and opposition groups rejoiced as aging Malawi President Kamuzu Banda announced a referendum on the introduction of multiparty politics.

Like Kenya's President Daniel Arap Moi before him, Banda — believed to be in his 90s — first bucked against the decision by donors to suspend non-humanitarian aid until he introduced political reforms.

But Kenya is now heading for multiparty elections and Banda has taken the first step to end one-party rule after governing for 28 years.

Banda has also faced unprecedented internal opposition this year, and the referendum announcement has been welcomed by the opposition Alliance for Democracy led by trade unionist Chakufwa Chihana who is on trial for sedition.

The alliance listed several demands, including the appointment of an independent referendum commission to govern access to the media.

It also called for the release of all political prisoners, an end to political trials, an amnesty for exiles and UN and OAU monitoring.

In Lusaka another opposition group, the United Front for Multi-party Democracy, also gave a cautious welcome to the plan. Spokesman George Kanyanya said "as soon as we get details and the position of exiles on the issue, we will be ready to pack our bags and go home".

The Commonwealth, which both Malawi and Kenya belonged to, said in Harare a year ago that members had to clean up their political acts in five months with the loss of 30,000 jobs.

But it was the suspension of Western aid at a World Bank meeting in Paris in May that appeared to have brought Banda around.

On October 3 Banda, regularly accused of human rights abuses, told his Malawi Congress Party convention that the suspension of aid was hurting innocent people and accused donors of making "unnecessary" human rights demands.

The convention ruled out multiparty politics, saying it had brought civil and tribal strife in Africa.

Banda's grip on the country has reportedly weakened as he has become increasingly frail with age.

Much of the day-to-day running of the country is believed to be in the hands of Minister of State John Tembo.

Banda did not set a referendum date, saying only it would be held as soon as possible. — Sapa-AFP
Banda opponent dies in prison

HUMAN RIGHTS Alliance condemns inhuman treatment of Orton Chirwa and his wife:

LANTYRE - A leading opponent of Malawi's President Kamuzu Banda and the country's first attorney-general, Mr Orton Ching'ok Chirwa, has died in a Malawi prison, an opposition source said yesterday.

The spokesman for the Alliance for Democracy told Reuters news agency by telephone from Blantyre that Chirwa, a British-trained barrister and the country's first attorney-general, had died in the Blantyre prison on Tuesday afternoon.

A government spokesman said he had no immediate information on the matter.

Chirwa and his wife Vera had been in prison since their abduction from Zambia in 1981. They had gone into exile in Tanzania following an abortive cabinet revolt against Banda and his policies in 1964.

An Alliance statement faxed to Johannesburg said: "The Alliance holds the government fully responsible for his (Chirwa's) death and condemns the brutal and inhuman treatment that Mr Chirwa received and that his wife continues to receive in prison."

It called on the government "to clearly state the circumstances in which Mr Chirwa died and to declare a period of national mourning."

Chirwa was a founder of Malawi's sole legal party, the Malawi Congress Party. He was its first president before handing over the leadership to Banda on the latter's release from prison in 1960.

He was named attorney-general when Malawi became a self-governing country in 1963 ahead of independence from Britain the following year.

Diplomatic observers said the report of Chirwa's death was likely to put fresh pressure on Banda over Malawi's human rights record.

The president-for-life, who is in his 90s, has said he would hold a referendum among the country's 8.5 million people to determine whether they wanted a multiparty state. - Sapa Reuters

Banda's referendum shock

By MELINDA MAM

The boundaries of politics in Malawi were radically redefined the Sunday when Life President Kamuzu Banda made a surprise announcement that an unprecedented referendum would be held on whether Malawi should remain a one-party state or change to a pluralist democracy.

The exact date for the referendum was not set but the president said at a press conference held at his palace in the capital Lilongwe that it would be “as soon as possible” and voting would be by secret ballot.

Malawian pro-democracy campaigners, including the Protestant and Catholic churches, the Law Association of Malawi and the one-month-old pressure group the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) enthusiastically greeted the announcement as a concession to one of their own demands.

“This reinforces Aford’s long held position that it is only through a free and fair referendum that the current political crisis can be resolved,” Aford said in a statement.

Aford called on the government to establish an independent referendum commission to lay down procedures and that international observers from the United Nations, the Organisation of African Unity and other independent organisations should be invited to monitor the referendum.

But the statement added that for a genuinely free national debate on the issue there had to be guaranteed freedom of association, freedom of speech and the press and the repeal of the Preservation of Public Security Act which permits detention without trial.

The diplomatic community in Lilongwe was also caught off guard by the announcement as it seemed to be a complete about face for Banda and his Malawi Congress Party (MCP) after they unanimously decided at last month’s party congress in the colonial capital of Zomba that the MCP would remain as “the sole legal political party” in the country.

A spokesman from the American embassy said: “We welcome the initiative of the referendum as long as it is carried out fairly and there is enough time to get the logistics right.”

Political analysts say that the referendum is a sign of growing desperation by the Malawi government now that the donor aid freeze of $74-million has entered its sixth month.

Government departments have run out of funds to begin any new projects and hospitals across the country are critically short of drugs.

Also, Aford’s rising popularity is believed to be causing alarm in government circles. More than 25 000 people gathered outside the court house in Blantyre on October 13 as trade union leader Chadrifwa Chilima’s trial for sedition continued. According to eye witnesses, they cheered in the vernacular: “Chilima is the lion, the king of the wilderness. Banda is the hyena.”

Within days of the referendum announcement a second democracy pressure group, the United Democratic Front (UDF), went public after operating underground for several months.

The UDF’s formation is not regarded as a split in the opposition because they have pledged to work with Aford for their common goal. Mapopa Chipeta, Aford spokesman in Lusaka, said: “We are already talking to the UDF. We hope in future we can stand together on the same platform.”

As one diplomat said: “It is a very exciting atmosphere here. We are already witnessing the birth of party politics even before the referendum.”

Poison fears of Banda's opponents

MALAWI'S church leaders had some advice for life president Kamuzu Banda's most prominent opponent, Chakwusa Chihana: Do not send your suits to the cleaners. The church has reminded Mr. Chihana that among the many bizarre CIA schemes to kill Fidel Castro was one to impregnate his suit with poison, and warned that plotting murder is not unknown to the Malawi government.

The warning follows the death of another political prisoner, Orton Chirwa. He had been serving a life sentence for turning against Dr. Banda. A leaked copy of the official autopsy appears to show that Mr. Chirwa was strangled.

Malawi's Roman Catholic bishops are cautious since officials of the ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP) allegedly considered murdering them after a pastoral letter critical of the government in March.

set off a wave of resistance to the ageing dictator. Two weeks ago, under unprecedented pressure at home and abroad to reform, Dr. Banda was forced to call a referendum on ending nearly three decades of one-party rule.

But the clerics, businessmen, and lawyers who have come together to push for human rights and democracy do not see the vote, for which a date has yet to be set, as a signal that the 83-year-old ruler is softening. Instead, amid new arrests and official attacks on "subversives", they refuse even to drink the water on the table at talks with the ruling party.

"We don't trust these members of the MCP. We wouldn't take food or water from them. They have killed so many people," said Father Nazarius Ngwane, a Catholic Church representative at the talks. Pressure on Dr. Banda has been mounting up since the pastoral letter, signed by Malawi's dormant opposition. MALAWI's government had invited a team of UN experts to advise on how to conduct a referendum on a multiparty democracy, an opposition spokesman said in Blantyre at the weekend. The UN team was due to arrive in Lilongwe yesterday.

Japan sticks to aid ban on Malawi

HARARE — Japan would continue to withhold aid from Malawi until the country became more democratic, the new Japanese ambassador to Malawi said.

Shunsuke Horiechi said Japan was bound by the decision of the Paris Club of donor nations, which suspended annual aid of $150 million (R450 million) in an attempt to persuade the government to reform.

He said Japan welcomed a recent decision by President Kamuzu Banda to hold a referendum on the future of one-party rule.
Fear in a handful of dust

War in Angola and Mozambique, political changes in Malawi and Zambia — and drought all round.

ANDY MELDRUM reviews 1992 in southern Africa

A ngola's elusive quest for peace and Mozambique's determination not to repeat the same mistakes marked 1992 as a transitional year for southern Africa. While the entire region coped with the drought, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe continued their journeys towards more democratic systems.

Throughout most of the year it appeared that Angola was far ahead of Mozambique in the race for peace. Angola achieved a ceasefire and peace process leading to elections before Mozambique's interminable negotiations in Rome had even produced a cessation of violence.

But by the time the results of Angola's elections were announced in early October, the whole situation quickly unravelled as Jonas Savimbi's Unita rejected the outcome and fighting erupted throughout the country.

As 1992 came to a close Unita had taken control of the provinces of southern and central Angola, where its ethnically-based support is based, and had also taken key positions in northern Angola. Despite Unita's return to the government of two northern cities and Savimbi's conciliatory statements, it appears highly probable that Unita will attempt to seize control of the entire country before January 20, when Bill Clinton becomes US president.

The Bush administration has withheld its recognition of the newly elected Angolan government, making it difficult for Savimbi to wrest control.

At the same time, there are gathering rumours that the MPLA, under pressure from military hardliners, is preparing for a massive new year offensive to drive Unita back to its traditional strongholds.

The smirker hand of South Africa's Department of Military Intelligence (MI) cannot be ruled out as a factor in Angola. Known MI agents were with Savimbi throughout his election campaign and afterwards. The frontline states have accused South African planes of repeatedly violating their airspace, charging that South Africa's C-130 jets are flying heavy artillery and tanks to Unita-held areas.

That equipment could well be used in an assault on Luanda.

The violence, chaos and despair in Angola at the end of 1992 contrasts sharply with the guarded optimism prevailing in Mozambique. Although its ceasefire only took effect in November, Mozambique rapidly learned the mistakes made in Angola and appears to be sprinting towards a lasting settlement.

Both the Frelimo government and the Renamo rebels have stated their commitment to the peace process and open elections. Even more decisively in favour of peace has been the United Nation's decision to send 7,000 personnel to Mozambique — it sent 800 people to Angola.

The UN's special envoy to Mozambique, Aldo Ajello, has taken a high profile and is determined to see the UN force push Mozambique towards a genuine settlement. Admitting the UN made mistakes in Angola, Ajello insists the international force in Mozambique will not permit the election campaign to begin until all military forces are disarmed and dispersed from their camps.

Clearly, Mozambique's peace timetable, which calls for elections in October 1993, is unrealistic as it is already behind schedule in several key regards. In Angola, such lapses from the timetable were glossed over by the UN monitors, but in Mozambique Ajello has stipulated that a longer time frame must be set, giving the country at least 18 months to prepare for elections.

Political developments were not as decisive in the rest of the region, although drought continued to bring misery to millions and sap economic development. Millions of tons of food were imported to avert famine.

Malawi experienced tumult as activists pressed for an end to the oneparty stranglehold in which President for Life Hastings Banda has held the country. Although Banda's régime is still firmly in control, former leaders like Chakufwa Chihana, now jailed, challenge the system, and it will be hard to turn back the clock.

In Zambia, the new government of President Frederick Chiluba struggled to run the bankrupt country more justly and efficiently than his predecessor, Kenneth Kaunda. As cholera broke out again in Zambia, the jury is still out on whether Chiluba's government can achieve real improvements in the living standards of Zambians.

Zimbabwe's political situation remained largely static, with President Robert Mugabe's government widely unpopular in the cities, but with no effective opposition to pose a challenge to it.

Banda agrees to allow free referendum

BLANTYRE - A referendum on a one-party versus multiparty system of government in Malawi will be held on March 18, President Kamuzu Banda announced.

Speaking on Malawi TV, Banda said he accepted the UN report on the conduct of a free and fair referendum.

Pressure groups and the ruling Congress Party will be allowed to campaign in the run-up to the referendum but will need prior police permission. Both sides will be allowed access to the mass media.

Malawi referendum hailed

LUSAKA. — Lusaka-based Malawi opposition parties have welcomed news of Malawi's March 15 referendum but have appealed to the authorities to allow more voters to register. Malawi Alliance for Democracy spokesman Frank Mayanga said yesterday that he welcomed President Kamuzu Banda's announcement but said opposition parties should be given a chance to campaign and canvass for pluralist politics.

Malawian activist applies for bail

Malawian opposition leader Chakufwa Chihana has applied for bail pending his appeal against a conviction for sedition.

Lawyer Sazuka Mhango said the bail application was submitted to a Supreme Court judge on Monday.

Chihana (52) was sentenced to two years in prison with hard labour on December 14 on two counts of sedition for importing and possessing banned literature.

He is a leading opponent of President-for-life Kamuzu Banda, who has called a referendum for March 15 on whether or not Malawi should remain a one-party state.

Mhango said the legal authorities were preparing the record of the lower court to present to the Supreme Court for the appeal.

"We would think the record should be ready in the next week or so," Mhango said.

The appeal hearing itself would depend on when the Supreme Court could be assembled — Sapa-Reuters
Editor held and papers

impounded in Malawi

Malawian police have arrested an opposition editor and confiscated 20,000 copies of a new dissident newspaper due to have been distributed this weekend, dissident sources said yesterday.

The sources said Felix Mpondi, a member of the opposition Alliance for Democracy (Aford) and editor of the New Express, was arrested on New Year's Day at Lilongwe Airport on his return to Malawi from Zambia where the paper had been printed.

Aford is seeking an end to autocratic one-party rule by President-for-life Kamuzu Banda, who has ruled Malawi since independence from Britain in 1964. He has called a referendum on the issue of one-party rule for March 15.

Sources reached by telephone in Malawi said police had refused to tell Mpondi's family or lawyers where they were holding him. He had not been charged with any offence as far as was known.

No government official was immediately available for comment.

The sources said police had also confiscated South African newspapers and two World Bank training manuals from the luggage of veteran politician Machipisa Muthalib on his return to Malawi on Tuesday. Muthalib was released on June 12, 1992 after 27 years in prison in Malawi and had been in South Africa for medical treatment.—Sapa-Reuters
Ides of March set for Banda’s poll

By Chris McGreal
in Johannesburg

MALAWI’S ageing dictator, President for Life Hastings Banda, has named March 15 for a referendum on the future of one-party rule. In a New Year’s Eve address to the nation, the 83-year-old leader promised to abide by United Nations recommendations for the poll, including an independent electoral commission.

Democracy campaigners said they were concerned at the short time available for campaigning, and at restrictions such as the requirement that the highly politicised police force must approve public gatherings.

But opposition leaders said they were confident of a sizeable majority in favour of a return to multiparty politics, which was abolished in 1966, two years after independence from Britain.

“The UN had recommended four or five months for the campaign, but I think the mood is in favour of a multi-party system,” said William Chisimba, a leading official in the Alliance for Democracy, a coalition of human rights lawyers, businessmen, multiparty activists, and church leaders. Mr Chisimba said the groups would meet later this week to decide strategy, and “we will have some demands to put to the government on how the referendum is run. But we are pleased it has come.”

Dr Banda — who once commented, “They say my people love me, and I would be naive to deny it” — has come under increasing pressure in the past year to reform his autocratic and repressive system. A highly critical Amnesty International report was followed by a pastoral letter from Malawi’s Roman Catholic bishops attacking the lack of human rights and an exploitative economic system.

Riots over low pay and food shortages, in which nearly 40 people died in May, shook Dr Banda. His belated attempts to alleviate the plight of the poor have been dashed by drought and a sharp cut in non-humanitarian foreign aid in protest at human rights abuses. In October, Dr Banda’s opponents set up the Alliance for Democracy to press for

Despite the promise of a free vote, the alliance fears the government will use its extensive security apparatus to prevent multiparty politics from campaigning, especially in rural areas where the ruling party controls most aspects of daily life, including food distribution.

Dr Banda has also hinted he intends using the voters’ roll from recent parliamentary elections, although large numbers of Malawi’s 8.5 million people, many of them his opponents, did not bother to register for the one-party poll. Dr Banda has not said whether he will allow international monitoring of the referendum or permit opponents access to the state-controlled media.

The alliance will also probably be without its leader during the campaign. Malawi’s most prominent democracy activist, the trade-unionist Chakufwa Chihana, was sentenced to two years’ hard labour last month for calling for exactly what Dr Banda is promoting. On Monday, the supreme court will hear Mr Chihana’s application for bail until his appeal.

However, the result of the Ides of March referendum may prove, Dr Banda still holds a number of cards even if the poll does not go his way. He may take the view of Kenya’s Daniel arap Moi, to let the opposition exist; organise and tear itself apart. In addition, even if multi-party politics are permitted, an election is not assured. Parliamentary elections are not due for five years and Dr Banda long ago declared himself president for life.
Crowds flock to Malawi rally

More than 100,000 people took part in Malawi's first officially approved opposition rally yesterday, organisers said.

A representative of the opposition Alliance for Democracy (AFORD) said the huge crowd turned out although no public announcements had been made and the authorities had torn down publicity banners.

Yesterday's rally in Blantyre, the first permitted by the government, was addressed by opposition figures from AFORD, the Public Affairs Committee and the United Democratic Front.

President Kamuzu Banda, who banned multiparty politics in 1966, has said a referendum on whether Malawi should allow opposition parties to operate would take place on March 15.

Banda announced the referendum under intense pressure from Western donor nations.

Banda sets up board to look at detentions

LILONGWE — Malawi President Dr Kamuzu Banda, under pressure to introduce political reforms to his one-party rule, has appointed an eight-member panel to review detention laws, it was reported yesterday.

The report said members of the Detention Review Tribunal, chaired by High Court Judge Leonard Unyolo, included traditional chiefs, a priest and cabinet secretary Mr MacDonald Banda.

Dr Banda, in power since Malawi's independence from Britain in 1964, used detention laws to silence opponents, many of whom fled the country.

Last year Malawi's mainly Western donors cut off annual aid of $150 million (about R450m) in protest against its human rights record.

Dr Banda has called a referendum on March 13 to decide if Malawi should abandon single-party rule.

Six days of horror in Huambo

A Swiss Red Cross worker described yesterday six days of horror in the embattled Angolan city of Huambo, as the UN continued pulling its personnel out of bases around the country.

Isabelle Buttaz, 33, was trapped in Huambo when fighting erupted there 10 days ago between government forces and troops of Jonas Savimbi's Unita.

For the next six days she was unable to venture outdoors, sleeping in the basement and listening to almost continuous small-arms fire, punctuated by artillery shells and government air strikes raining down on the city.

Buttaz was described by Red Cross delegation chief Vincent Nicod as "a very courageous woman."

She was head of the local Red Cross mission, which included five Swiss, three French and a Briton, who were trapped in separate houses.

Nicod said: "The hospital is not functioning, the medical personnel cannot work for security reasons. That means wounded are not cared for. People are dying without any possibility of assistance."

"All public services have broken down. There are food and water shortages, the city is paralysed."

Buttaz and the other expatriate Red Cross staff were evacuated by road convoy with UN personnel on Thursday. They said they would return as soon as possible.

In a statement issued in the Ivory Coast, Unita said yesterday "more than 500 people were killed on both sides and an unknown number injured" as government forces were "virtually wiped out."

Meanwhile, the UN Angolan mission Unavem announced yesterday it had pulled its personnel out of 40 bases around the country. Fewer than 30 bases were staffed now, it said.

A statement from the office of special representative Margaret Anstee also indicated growing impatience with Savimbi over attempts to hold a ceasefire conference in Huambo.

The statement said Savimbi was supposed to call Anstee personally at the weekend to discuss Unita's new demand that political as well as military matters should be on the agenda, but the call had not come through.

Unita said "murderous fighting" at the weekend had left only a "little pocket of (government) resistance" in Huambo, where Unita said it had destroyed 12 T-55 tanks.

The pilot was captured.

Unita's West Africa representative, John Marques da Cunha, told AFP he had spoken by telephone yesterday to Savimbi, who was still in Huambo.

Meanwhile, Portugal's vice-consul in Luanda said Portuguese were evacuated yesterday by ship from the Angolan oil town of Soyo because of fighting nearby.

Teargas at Malawi rally

POLICE fired teargas at a pro-democracy rally in Zomba, Malawi, but meetings by about 200 000 people supporting an end to one-party rule were mostly trouble-free, opposition groups said yesterday.

The weekend meetings in Blantyre, Mzuzu and Zomba were to demonstrate support for a "yes" vote in a March referendum on whether opposition parties should be allowed in Malawi for the first time in 25 years.

The opposition Alliance for Democracy accused police of firing teargas at students chanting anti-government slogans. Alliance spokesman Aaron Longwe said several people were slightly injured.

President Kamuzu Banda, who banned opposition groups in 1966, agreed to a referendum under strong pressure from political opponents, Western donor nations and human rights groups concerned that Malawi was not following an African trend towards greater political freedom.

Longwe's wife Alice said people had stayed away in droves from a pro-government rally staged by the ruling MCP in Mzuzu over the weekend.

The alliance has demanded guarantees that the referendum would be free and fair and urged the government to set up an independent commission to lay down rules on media access.

It also wants an amnesty for Malawian exiles, an end to political trials and the immediate and unconditional release of political prisoners.  — Sapa-REuter.

Food aid for Malawi ‘critical’

MALAWI would experience a critical food shortage within a few weeks unless efforts were made to direct supplies to the drought-ravaged country, the World Food Programme warned yesterday.

Food programme spokesman Mercedes Sayagues told a media briefing in Johannesburg it would take up to three months to ship UN food supplies to Malawi. As commercial maize stocks were expected to be depleted at the end of this month, an urgent appeal had been made to other countries in the region to lend part of their food reserves to Malawi. Several rural markets had already run out of grain, she said.

The Harare-based food programme and the Southern African Development Community had also requested that transit countries and transport operators give priority to Malawi-bound shipments.

Sayagues said the crisis had arisen because Malawi was late in placing commercial orders for food, and EC pledges of food aid for the market sector remained low. The “political vacuum” in Malawi had meant vital decisions had been delayed.

But while Malawi was most at risk, Sayagues said, it was not the only country in the region facing dire food shortages.

The war in Angola had forced the World Food Programme to suspend many of its air-itts into provincial capitals, and nearly 700 tons of stockpiles had been looted during the past few weeks in Saurimo, Mbanje and Cuito.

The programme was trying to replace the 4,000 tons of food lost through looting and fires since fighting broke out after elections.

And shortages in Tanzania’s lake region had prompted the food programme and government to provide 17,000 tons of emergency food aid for more than a million people.

Although rainfall had been good in Zambia and Zimbabwe, Sayagues said, it had still not compensated for the scarce rains last year, and most dams were still less than half full. But the rains had provided a fertile breeding ground for an army worm infestation, which was threatening to destroy maize crops.

And in Swaziland, estimates for this year’s harvest were no better than last year’s bleak season, she added.

The peace agreement in Mozambique had allowed food aid to reach most parts of the country by airlift or convoy, Sayagues said, but shortfalls in pledges still threatened to jeopardise the relief effort.

In a recent assessment of this largest drought relief effort in Africa, the World Food Programme and SADC said the operation had been highly successful. Almost 5 million tons of drought-related imports for southern African countries had been delivered to regional ports between April and December last year.

But Sayagues said one of the most important aspects of the operation was that it had boosted co-operation in the region.

Meanwhile, the SADC warned yesterday that southern Africa could suffer severe drought again this year, after being ravaged last year by the worst drought this century, reports Sapa-Reuters.

“We do not want to be alarmists, but we just want to alert the people (of southern Africa) to the possibilities of another drought so they can be prepared,” SADC food specialist Reginald Magwana said in Harare.

“Last year higher temperatures in the eastern Pacific ocean caused the drought, and it looks as though in January and February we are likely to be short of rainfall because of the same factors again,” he said.

De Klerk loses white support

WHILE the ANC was maintaining its popularity among blacks, President P W de Klerk and his National Party were steadily losing the support of the black and white South Africans, according to a recent Markinor poll.

Markinor deputy MD Christine Weisens said yesterday results of a November poll on socio-political and economic trends showed who definitely vote for him.

The SACP was included in the survey for the first time, and found strong support. While only 8% of blacks would vote for the party, 31% said they would perhaps vote for it, and 14% felt good about it.

Activists test Banda

THREE senior officials of the externally based Malawi Democratic Party will return to Malawi to take up the campaign for multipartyism in preparation for the referendum on the issue called by President Kamuzu Banda.

The three — John Wunandi Banda, Robert Kaembe Khembo and Shaleo Botawota Kondowe — leave Johannesburg tomorrow “with the full knowledge that the government may act against us”, Banda said.

He said that if President Banda took action against the group, it would be proof to the world that he was not sincere about testing the will of the people in a referendum. The poll is set for May 15.

The Malawi government has taken action against pressure groups inside the country such as the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) and the United Democratic Front.

Presbyterian minister the Rev Peter Kaleso was detained, and reportedly tortured, after a rally called by Aford as part of its campaign to end one-party rule. Police had banned Kaleso and Aford’s deputy publicity secretary, Aaron Longwe, from addressing rallies. Editor Felix Mponda was also detained.
Speech ban in Malawi overruled

By Michael Simmons

A HIGH court judge in Blantyre, the former capital of Malawi, has declared that a police chief was acting illegally when he banned political activists from speaking at public rallies.

The ruling will hearten opponents of President Hastings Banda who have been routinely harassed, arrested, and tortured for speaking out against the president.

The police chief at Mzuzu, in northern Malawi, had warned local leaders of the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) that 11 named people, five of them church ministers, would not be allowed to speak at public rallies. He ordered Aford to cooperate "to avoid inconveniences."

But Judge D.G. Tambala ruled that the police should stick to maintaining peace, law and order and that this did not give them a licence to meddle in politics. The police order banning certain speakers at public meetings was without any legal basis, he added.

In a related development, President Banda announced that he had postponed a referendum on one-party rule by three months at the request of the United Nations Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali. The "President for Life" said he had put back the referendum to June 14.
LUSAKA — The ruling Malawi Congress Party has refused opposition demands for secret balloting in a referendum on one-party rule. The party insists that voters will drop their ballots in boxes marked "yes" or "no."
Trio's detention routine, says Malawi official.

By Joe Latagomo
Star Africa Service

The detention of three senior officials of the Malawi Democratic Party who returned to Malawi at the weekend was a "routine procedure" and applied to anyone who had been out of the country for a long period and may have been involved in subversive activities, a spokesman for the Malawi Embassy in Pretoria said yesterday.

Percy Kachipande confirmed that John Wumandla Bande, Robert Kaembe Kyembo and Shaley Botawata Kolndowe were detained on their arrival in Lilongwe, but stressed that they could not be detained indefinitely. "They will either be charged or released, as the law only provides for detention for up to three days," he said.

Peterkins Simwaka, vice-secretary-general of the Malawi Democratic Party, said the MDP had had no response to enquiries from the government.

The MDP says the decision to send the three back to Malawi was to test President Kamuzu Banda's commitment to free political activity in preparation for a referendum.

Banda's Bandas, head of the regime's security forces, said the Malawian people were not at peace because the country's leaders were not addressing the root causes of the conflict.

The Malawian government has been criticized for its handling of the protests, with some analysts arguing that the response was overly forceful.

The Malawian president, Peter Mutharika, has called for peace and called on the opposition to engage in dialogue.

In an interview with a local newspaper, the president said that the country was in a difficult situation, but that the government was working to address the issues.

The Malawian police have been accused of using excessive force during recent protests, with reports of violence and arrests.

The Malawian government has also come under fire for its handling of the economy, with some analysts arguing that the high levels of unemployment and poverty are contributing to the unrest.

In an interview with a local radio station, the president said that the government was working to address the economic challenges, but that progress was slow.

As pressure for democracy grows in Malawi, the skeletons are being hauled out of President Banda's cupboard, reports Joe Latikomo of the Sovietan Africa News Service.

President Kamuzu Banda.

By 1992 international attention was increasingly being focused on Malawi's human rights record. An Amnesty International report raised the matter of inhuman conditions in Malawi's overcrowded jails. Perhaps more than any others, Orton and Vera Chirwa symbolise the human rights abuses in Malawi. Their case may not be the worst, for theirs at least had an international focus. Other lesser known detainees have suffered or are still suffering unspeakable abuses, hidden away from the public eye in Malawi's overcrowded jails.

Public threat

The charges appeared to have little effect on President Banda. As recently as February last year he threatened in a public speech that any opposition member who returned to Malawi would be made "meat for crocodiles".

His motivation was perhaps illustrated by his announcement in 1966 that he would detain "ten thousand, a hundred thousand" in order to "maintain political stability and efficiency in administration".

The year before, during the trial of a political opponent named Silombela, he had publicly declared "I know he is going to be found guilty. What kind of judge can acquit Silombela?" Silombela was duly found guilty, sentenced to death and hanged.

Banda has the power to appoint and dismiss judges. And magistrates who have found government opponents not guilty have found themselves without jobs.

The report of the British legal group describes their findings as "chilling". An example of what they found is the account of two female workers who had been arrested for allegedly being supporters of the multiparty movement.

The two women were jailed in Chichewa prison where prisoners have reportedly been forced to stand the whole night because of deliberate overcrowding.

One of the women estimated that on average one prisoner died every second night. She told the group that she was beaten and that a man pulled up her dress and pressed a pair of pliers into her private parts "until I bled."

In the cell, "there were so many of us that we had to sleep in two rows next to the walls. We all faced in the same direction. When somebody wanted to change direction, she shouted 'let's change direction' and we all changed together."
Moi woos opposition

Joe Khamisi reports from Nairobi for the Sowetan Africa

KENYA's ruling Kanu party is wooing opposition politicians — sometimes with large cash bribes — in a move that some fear might lead to the country reverting to being a one-party state.

Kenyans voted in December in their first multiparty election in 26 years. With the opposition feuding and divided, Kanu won a poll marred by allegations of fraud and irregularities.

But it failed to win enough seats to give it complete control of Parliament. Now Kanu has embarked on a vigorous campaign to lure opposition politicians to its ranks. Several have already taken the bait and switched allegiance to the government.

Some politicians fear that if this trend accelerates it could cripple pluralism in Kenya. They say this has happened twice before in Kenya's 30 years of independence and could easily happen again.

Two opposition MPs, Dr. Prosec Muthoni of the Democratic Party and Charles Owino of the Ford Kenya Party, have already crossed over to Kanu.

Calling on Kanu's prodigal sons to return home, President Daniel arap Moi said Kanu was willing to accept opposition MPs if they defected. But Kanu's call is not limited to parliamentarians. At least half a dozen other political figures and civic leaders, among them a mayor, have switched allegiance in the past fortnight.

Branding the defectors as traitors, opposition leaders say Kanu is trying to consolidate its grip on power by increasing the 100 parliamentary seats it won in the election against the opposition's 89.

Even with the 12 nominated seats going to Kanu, Moi was still short of the two-thirds majority of 133 seats needed to adopt constitutional amendments and other major legislation.

Kanu's efforts to make up the shortfall by wooing opposition MPs backfired last week when a Ford Kenya member, Ferdinand Obure, disclosed that he had been offered the equivalent of $400,000 to defect to Kanu but had spurned the offer.

Under Kenya's constitution an MP automatically loses his seat if he leaves his party. This means that by-elections must be held in the defectors' constituencies and it is by no means certain that Kanu will win them.

Two years ago, when Oginga Odinga's Kenya People's Party began attracting disaffected Kanu MPs, the government pushed through the constitutional amendment requiring defecting MPs to lose their seats.

Now Kanu finds this resounding to its disadvantage and some analysts are predicting that the government will try to get another 22 opposition MPs to vote for a constitutional amendment to scrap the now-embarrassing provision. They could then cross the floor without losing their seats and thereby having to fight a by-election.

Moi does not hide his abhorrence of pluralism and says publicly that he was forced into it by donor nations who made it a condition of granting economic aid.

Despite his adoption of multipartyism however, it is uncertain whether Kenya will get any of the 350 million US dollars of balance-of-payments support that was suspended by the donors in 1991 in a bid to force Kanu to adopt democratic reforms.

An International Monetary Fund (IMF) team that spent two weeks in Kenya assessing the situation left last weekend without saying a word about whether aid would be resumed.

Diplomats have said the team was unimpressed with the little Kanu had done to meet the donors' demands for a wide range of economic and political reforms.

The team is due to return next month and may not be any more impressed by Kanu's latest moves to buy defections from the elected opposition.

Poll on multiparty system

Malawi at the crossroads

Camil Daya reports from Blantyre for the Sowetan Africa News Service

---

BANDYRE, Malawi
Thousands of people gathered at the Kwanza International Conference Centre grounds in Blantyre chanting, "We want change! We want change!" and "Kwa we wa one-party system!"

At another rally attended only by schoolchildren, some women and a handful of elders at the nearby Lomwe Community Centre ground, the song was different. The woman leading the song asked, "Muthama yana kwa? (Whom do you want today?)" and the rest of the people responded, "Ngwasa soka? (Ngwasa what?)" This is a Malawi Congress Party rally addressed by the Ngwasa, President Kamuzu Banda, himself.

The difference between the attendance at this rally and the opposition rally at the conference centre boils down to the president if it indicates the outcome of the referendum on June 16.

Volunteers will be going door to door to see whether Malawians should switch from a one-party rule under Banda's Malawi Congress Party to multi-party democracy.

"Ngwasa" means "brave one" but the elderly president may need more than courage to accept the result of the referendum if it goes against him. He has agreed to the poll only under pressure from Malawians' foreign donors and he is losing the referendum is likely to lose a subsequent election after more than three decades of autocratic rule.

His opponents consist of a coalition of two groups, the United Democratic Front (UDF) and the Alliance for Democracy (Aford). But it is the UDF which seems to command most respect, both locally and internationally.

A plausible reason for this is that the UDF leader, veteran politician Bakili Muluzi, happens to be a figure the leader of Aford, Chakwika Chihana, remains unaccustomed to a Zomba prison cell that it is at its best. Muluzi continues to be a thorn in the flesh of the Malawi Congress Party and its leader.

As a product of the system, Muluzi is ironically well-placed to attack on the hustings. After receiving training in and working in the MCP's youth wing, the Malawi Young Pioneers, he rose to become the number two man in the party as secretary-general.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the MCP leadership appears to be making a determined effort to bring him into a competition. Recently, at the designation of the present MCP secretary-general, Wabon Delia Banda announced at a public rally in Muluzi's home town of Balaka that Muluzi had embezzled MCP funds when he was secretary-general — which is some 12 years ago now.

Banda's denunciation resulted in Muluzi landing up in a Blantyre jail a few hours later. Muluzi's lawyer was able to get him released on bail by pointing out that he had formally resigned as MCP secretary-general in 1983 and his resignation had been publicly accepted by Banda.

Since then Muluzi has campaigned tirelessly, holding rally after rally and drawing large crowds. He leads a formidable team comprising four former MCP secretaries-general and six former cabinet ministers.

But whether this will have a crucial effect on the referendum remains an open question. In fact, it has been alleged that these people never showed any signs of remorse when they worked with Banda as he committed his "crimes" against the Malawian people. Why, it is asked, are they opposing him now — for personal revenge or on behalf of the people?

Chakwika Chihana, on the other hand, has a clear record. He has been a veteran of Banda and his system from the beginning. This earned him seven years of detention without trial, more than 20 years of self-exile and now another jail sentence of two years.

Malawians know that political prisoners are treated with great cruelty in Malawi and respect Chihana for enduring this and still coming out fighting. Nevertheless, the fact is that he is in prison prevents him from campaigning, which appears to be exactly what the authorities intended.

Aford's campaign for the referendum has been directed by the deputy chairman, Luke Mthambulu, but the group has nevertheless been handicapped by the absence of its leader.

Chihana has appealed against his conviction and sentence but some of his associates have cast doubt on his chances of success because of the influence that Sambia Palace (the presidential residence) is alleged to have over the courts. However, his lawyer, Barbara Mthangano, appears to be optimistic that the court will give a favorable ruling when its decision is handed down next month.

Meanwhile, the referendum campaign is picking up speed, with Banda appealing to Malawians to vote against the multiparty system and the opposition counter-attacking that the one-party system was imposed on the country without any consultation with the people. They claim that the one-party system was installed for the advantage of those in power.

Banda is being urged to emulate former Tanzania President Julius Nyerere and abandon one-party rule and multi-party rule. Despite his age, which is said to be somewhere in the nineties, Banda shows every sign of trying to hang on to the end, whatever that may turn out to be.
‘Politics swung Chihana’s sentence’

By MELINDA HAMALI

MALAWI opposition leader Chakufwa Chihana’s two-year jail sentence for the possession and importation of seditious documents was this week reduced to nine months, but critics say the court ruling smacks of political interference.

Chihana is chairman of the Alliance for Democracy (Aford), one of two opposition movements campaigning for a “yes” vote in favour of multi-party democracy in the upcoming June 14 referendum. The former trade union leader has been in detention since April 6 last year.

Chief Justice Richard Banda told the packed supreme court room in Blantyre this week that through the documents, which included speeches Chihana had delivered to a conference of Malawian exiles in Zambia in March 1992, Chihana had tried to “arouse feelings of hatred, contempt or dissatisfaction against the president and his government.”

But the judge (no relation of President Kamuzu Banda) said the sentence imposed on Chihana by a high court judge on December 14 last year was too harsh. He reduced it to nine months on the first seditious count and six months on the second count, to run concurrently from the date of conviction.

Banda added that a further three months could be cut off the sentence for “good behaviour” — which would mean that Chihana would be released, ironically, on the day of Malawi’s referendum on pluralism.

The Chihana judgment comes in the wake of allegations of government interference with the judiciary. Earlier this month, the chief justice and Minister of Justice Friday Makuta were summoned to Sanjika Palace, on a full overlooking Blantyre, where the president instructed them to ensure that the supreme court upheld Chihana’s two-year sentence.

Makuta told the 90-year-old life president that this was not possible because Chihana’s lawyer, British barrister Edwin Glasgow, had destroyed the prosecution’s case. Glasgow had argued that the original judgment ran contrary to Malawi’s constitution, international law and the United Nations’ Declaration of Human Rights, of which Malawi is a signatory.

Makuta was so angry about this interference that he resigned — the first Malawian cabinet minister to quit voluntarily since 1964. After this week’s supreme court judgment, Makuta commented that the decision to uphold Chihana’s conviction was “based on malice” and that the opposition leader should have been acquitted.

Immediately after the judgment, Chihana’s colleagues in Aford called for the chief justice to resign. “He’s not capable of sitting on the (presidentially appointed) referendum commission which is running the referendum if he does not see freedom of expression as a fundamental right of all Malawians,” said Aford’s publicity secretary the Rev Aaron Longwe.
Rallies tell a tale of Malawi’s options

Despite the joining of the leading opposition figures, presidential council and the Malawi Congress Party to make a united bid to oust President Banda, the country is split. The opposition, which is commanded by President Banda’s key ally, the Malawi Congress Party (MCP) President Kenneth Maleko, may address the nation. The MCP President has agreed to back President Banda’s efforts to oust Malawi’s acting president, Tereza Kangwa. Kangwa, who was appointed by Banda, is facing impeachment proceedings before the High Court. The opposition is confident that it can force a change of government. However, the MCP, which is the country’s largest political party, warns that any policy change will not solve the country’s economic problems. Banda, who has been under pressure to resign, is due to address the nation on Thursday. The opposition has called for a nationwide protest against the government’s economic policies.

INTIMIDATION CLAIMS Fears as poll nears on dicing one-party system: (70)

By Camil Daya
Soviet Africa News Service

BELANTYRE— The run-up to Malawi's referendum on multiparty democracy, which doubles as an increasingly being expressed about whether the poll will be free and fair. The vote on June 14 will purportedly decide whether the country should abandon the one-party system, initially proposed by President Kamuzu Banda since 1966.

The referendum was forced on Banda by growing domestic and international opposition to his Malawi Congress Party's exclusive rule. But with opposition politicians accusing the government of intimidation and uncertainty whether the poll will produce a generally acceptable result.

Human rights groups are reporting and are not been seen since.

People who reported the abductions had been disappeared recently and the abductions were conducted by members of the Malawi Congress Party. He said some UNP members had been abducted first and then tortured. Their fate remains a mystery.

Malaya said he had himself been harassed by the police.

The MCP claimed in January that Malaya hadventured its funds 12 years ago when he was the minister of the interior. He was charged with plotting to overthrow the government.

However, he was arrested within hours and held that the accusations were not true, according to the police.

A priest of the Catholic Church said an LDR group had harassed the police violently against the police.

The priest who serves as a civil rights advocate in Lilongwe, said local officials of the Malawi Congress Party threatened him with death if he held a meeting when police permission had been obtained.

The priest, who is the son of a media activist in Lilongwe, said if the police were to be killed by the police, he would be killed by the police.

In some instances, MCP officials had arranged for donors known as "vagabonds" to disrupt rallies.

The churchman described one recent occasion at a village where 25 km from Lilongwe, where the Malawians had gathered to hear the leader. He added that the MCP had called in to those who did not want to be there.

As Banda's vehicle approached about 10 "vagabonds" sprung from the truck and attacked it. The driver turned the vehicle and fled and the rally did not take place.

Another opposition group, the Alliance for Democracy (AFD), has suffered through the continued imprisonment of its leader, Chakwera Chirwa. Recently, Alford and his followers used to stir up the MDP to try to stir up violence in the referendum by registering the 1,000,000 signatures from Mozambique as votes.

According to Alford, the government threatened to expel the refugees if they did not vote for the MDP. The government has strongly denied the allegations but Alford insists his information is accurate.

While President Kamuzu Banda appears determined to maintain his rule by force of arms, events suggest it is weakening.

The police system, which has tended to serve Banda's ends, is responding to pressure to conform to acceptable norms, thanks to the pressure comes from within the police and from the heavily controlled Ministry of Justice for private practice.

Working under the umbrella of a surprisingly vigorous Malawi National League, the army in effect overseeing the breakdown of the scene of public interest in the charged of secession and sent him back to prison for nine months with hard labor.

The finding of the international community and shocked many Malawians.

AFD officials immediately called for the disbandment of the chief justice saying Malawians had lost confidence in him.

They said his wife was the sister of a prominent Malawian lawyer. He was accused of corruption and was convicted in government courts.

Chirwa's appeal in March was aimed at securing his freedom. The trial jury was a powerful figure in the MDP, according to Justice Minister Friday Nkalulu, who referred to other trials where witnesses over the Chirwa's case and the chief justice was appointed.

In an apparent effort to direct attention from the judicial system, President Banda has set up a Political Donations Review Tribunal, purportedly to resolve the cases of political donations. Some "sawwys" fear, however, that it will merely confirm their donations.

One member of the Malawi Law Society, who did not want to be named, told me that the tribunal was below the High Court in status and yet it was being treated as if it was above all other legal structures.

He added that the composition of the tribunal is unknown, and included MCP officials such as Mr. Mvula, a former chairman and chief cabinet officer under Banda.
Malawi legalises poll violence

By Chris McGreal

MALAWI'S life president, Dr Kamuzu Banda, has imposed new laws that opposition leaders say give his Malawi Congress Party (MCP) immunity from prosecution for violence and intimidation during the referendum campaign on the future of one-party rule.

The Malawi parliament, where the MCP holds every seat, has granted the ruling party, its officials and members the same legal immunity given to government ministers. This formalises the long-standing practice of a government that has frequently abused its powers in dealing with opponents.

But the latest regulations reflect occasional dissent within the legal system at increasing officially-sanctioned violence against Dr Banda's opponents and a renewed crackdown on freedom of speech. The Malawi high court recently overturned the ban on two opposition newspapers, but the government can now suppress publications.

The referendum on June 14 was called under pressure from foreign governments which suspended aid in protest at human rights abuses in Malawi. But with at least one independent poll showing a majority in favour of multi-party democracy, the government is resorting to its well-tested methods of repression.

The main opposition group, the Alliance for Democracy, says there has been a sharp increase in the number of attacks by the MCP's Young Pioneers since the new law was approved. "The MCP and its officials have now been given the mandate to act in any way they choose, knowing that they are not personally liable for their actions. This amounts to giving the MCP and its functionaries immunity from civil and criminal liability," the alliance said.

The British-based anti-censorship group, Article 19, this week issued a report condemning the government's handling of the referendum campaign. The report says that since the referendum was announced in October, police have regularly banned Dr Banda's opponents from addressing public meetings, prevented campaign rallies and used an extensive network of laws to restrict freedom of speech.

Dr Banda has kept the alliance's leader, Chakufwa Chihana, out of the campaign. Mr Chihana was sentenced to two years' hard labour on charges of sedition after calling for a multi-party system. The term was reduced to nine months on appeal.

In January Dr Banda banned advocates of multi-partyism from broadcasting on state-controlled radio. Article 19 says that, in a typical week, the only daily newspaper in Malawi, the government-run Daily Times, published 158 column inches supporting one-party rule. It included five front-page stories with headlines such as "One party means peace." No article supported the alternative view.
Malawi row over separate poll boxes

HARARE — Malawi's opposition groups will boycott next month's referendum on multi-party democracy unless President Kamuzu Banda's government agrees to one of their key demands within a week, a spokesman said yesterday.

Peter Kafula of the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) said the government had a week in which to accept a single ballot box instead of separate boxes for "yes" and "no" votes.

Opposition groups believe the use of two boxes in the June 14 poll would intimidate voters, who would fear reprisals if they were seen voting for an end to Banda's one-party system.

The Malawi government censored last week's edition of The Weekly Mail and Guardian Weekly, excising an article about Malawi from each and every copy of the Guardian Weekly before allowing the paper to go on sale.

The article, by Guardian regional correspondent Chris McGrath, focused on new laws giving the ruling Malawi Congress Party what amounts to immunity from prosecution for acts of intimidation and violence in the run-up to a referendum in June on the future of one-party rule.

Distribution of The Weekly Mail in Malawi was delayed by a day while the offending article was removed leaving a hole on the bottom of page 7, although a front page reference to the story, headed "Banda makes violence legal", was left untouched.

The censoring of foreign coverage of events in Malawi continues, despite considerable liberalisation of the press inside the country in the run-up to the referendum. At least eight opposition weeklies and monthlies—most hardring in their criticism—have been set up since President-for-life Hastings Banda agreed to the plebiscite in October.
LUSAKA — Jailed Malawian pro-democracy activist Chakufwa Chihana is in very poor condition and needs urgent medical attention, a leading African trade unionist who visited him this week said yesterday.

Chihana (52), a leader of the opposition Alliance for Democracy (AFORD), is serving a reduced six-month prison term for sedition.

Dickson Shamenda, president of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordinating Council, said Chihana was coughing blood.

Shamenda said that despite his condition, Chihana continued to insist on the need for multiparty democracy in Malawi. — Sapa-Reuters

Why use two boxes when one will do?

KALEMBO MALENGWA

The last straw of three men scandalized into the back of an Avel Malawi van after dark recently was the 61-year-old man who was dragged off his underwear and his uniformed striped trousers. Malemba feared thefts from witnesses. Malemba fears that the village will not be allowed to dress up. Malemba says he is among hundreds of people who voted in a campaign of intimidation and manipulation on behalf of Malawi’s Life President Kamuzu Banda in the run-up to June 14 referendum on the future of one-party rule in the country. Members of the ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP) have been invited to the intimidation campaign extending from attacks on opposition activists to threats to cut off food to ensure villages if they vote against one-party rule. Banda is also attempting to manipulate the referendum by forcing voters to choose between ballot boxes marked for and against the one-party state. Malemba, Blantyre’s regional vice-chairman of the opposition United Democracy Front (UDF), and his two colleagues were dragged to the offices of the MCP’s youth league. About 22 members of the youth league were on hand, led by local chairman, Paul Kashika. "Do you think that by forcing the multi-party movement you are going to be monsters in a new government?" Kashika asked. Malemba was an inactive, 60-year-old Musasa Umali Mangja and ordered him to beat his colleague. When Mangja refused to do so, the youth league chairman thrashed him. "The three captives were beaten until blood poured from their bodies. The third man, Wadoni Mrema, fastened. After an hour and a half, the captives finally ended their demands that they stop seeing others as 'confusants.' They were then given papers to sign, renouncing 'multi-party activity.' But they refused and were imprisoned in a cell in the local jail. Three days later, having received no food or medical attention, they were discovered during a routine visit by members of the International Red Cross. Kashika denies that the beatings took place, saying the three men were arrested for 'speaking ill of the party,' but their wounds are still visible. Banda issued a promising referendum for Oct 29, but the church and others in international ad. The president's aides have reinforced his own perception of his popularity for years, but after nearly three decades of rule by terror the MCP looks at even the limited freedom to criticise now offered. The government says the vote will be secret, despite the separate ballot boxes that will be provided for pro and anti-reform votes, because the boxes will be locked in a room which each voter will enter alone. But MCP activists are spreading the word that voters will be photographed or watched. United Nations observers fear the use of two ballot boxes means the way for manipulation "I can't see how the MCP can win unless they rig the vote. Their existence on two ballot boxes is an indication that this is what they want to do," said one foreign official. The UN envoy in Malawi, Michael Haynes, has proposed sending a mediator after the main church groups said last Friday that they would boycott the referendum on the grounds that it was not free and fair. The government appears to have accepted that it has lost the vote in the cities and is targeting rural areas. Food and drought-relief programs are portrayed as coming from Banda's personal rule, with the threat that if the vote is lost the wrong way, they may be no more deliverable. People who have fled drought-stricken areas are warned that if they do not support Banda they will be 'dispossessed' and lose their land. The government has also excluded sections of the population from the ballot, including those aged between 18 and 21, who make up about a third of the population and are considered to be overwhelming opponents of the MCP. The army and police are also forbidden to vote. The military in particular is thought to be strongly in favour of a multi-party democracy. Only the Malawi Young Pioneers, whose existence is dependent on continued one-party rule, will be permitted to vote. Banda is the only campaigner allowed to broadcast his views on the state radio. Officially, the president does not campaign — he embarks on "crop inspections" around the country. During these visits, police forbid the opposition from holding rallies in the same region. Nonetheless, the referendum campaign has already brought about change. When Banda's descendents on his subjects to "inspect the crops," his subjects are no longer accompanied by their personal bodyguards. The president is required to donate gifts. The delegation would arrive ahead of the president to arrange to select a cow from a family with just three or a good chunk of the maize crop. Village headmen still make the pilgrimage to Banda's palace to pledge the loyalty of their subjects and hear the threats of retribution. But many are relying on a different message in their villages, and some have even come out publicly against the MCP. — The Guardian News
Banda's agents mount campaign of terror in Malawi

By Chris McGree
in Blantyre

KALEMBO MALENGA was the last of three men manhandled into the back of an Air Malawi van after dark on Sunday. If the young pro-government thugs dressed in their uniform red shirts had not snatched him in front of witnesses, Mr Malenga fears he might have paid more dearly for joining the campaign for democracy in Malawi.

Ant was the 61-year-old pensioner who was dragged off in his underwear.

"They told me when Mr Hastings Banda was being arrested by the British colonial authorities in 1959, he was not allowed to dress up," Mr Malenga said.

He is among hundreds of people abducted and tortured in a campaign of intimidation and manipulation on behalf of Life President Nkhoma. Dr Hastings Banda in the run-up to the June 14 referendum on the future of one-party rule by the Malawi Congress Party (MCP).

A desperate government is pursuing a dual strategy: recent new laws giving the party immunity from prosecution for violence against its opponents have heightened an intimidation campaign extending from attacks on opposition activists and threats to cut off food to whole villages if they vote against one-party rule.

Dr Banda is also attempting to manipulate the referendum by forcing voters to choose between ballot boxes marked for the one-party state.

Mr Malenga, the local vice-chairman of the opposition United Democratic Front (UDF), and his two colleagues were dragged to the offices of the MCP's youth league. About 22 members of the youth league were on hand, led by their local chairman, Paul Kachita.

"Do you think that by joining the multi-party movement you are going to be ministers in a new government?" he was asked.

Mr Kachita pushed a plastic box to 60-year-old Musa Umali Mayuga and told him to beat his companion. He refused and the youth league chairman threatened Mr Mayuga. Each of the captives was beaten in turn until blood was pouring from their backs. The third man, Wadi Atemia, fainted. An hour and a half later, the beating ended with final demands that they stop being "confusionists".

Each was given papers to sign announcing multi-party activity. Their refusal led to a cell in the local prison. Three days later, with no food or medical attention, they were discovered during a routine visit by the International Red Cross. Mr Kachita denies the beating took place, saying the three were arrested for "speaking ill of the party", but their wounds are still visible.

Dr Banda rushed to promising the referendum last October after wage riots, denunciations from the church and cuts in international aid in protest at human rights abuses.

The government says the vote will be secret despite the separate ballot boxes for pro- and anti-reform votes, because the boxes will be shut away in a room where each voter will enter alone. But MCP activists are spreading the word they will be photographed or watched. United Nations observers fear the use of two ballot boxes makes the system unworkable.

Nonetheless, the government has already brought about changes when Dr Banda delayed on his subjects to inspect the crops it is no longer accompanied by a ritual fleeing of the poor. Until the referendum, every village and town visited by the Life President was required to donate "gifts". A delegation arrived ahead of time to select a cow from a family with just three, or a good chunk of the maize crop.

Village headmen still make the pilgrimage to Dr Banda's palace to pledge the loyalty of their subjects and hear the threats of retribution. But many are relaying a different message in their villages and some have even come out publicly against the MCP.

Last week Dr Banda went so far as to open a prominent opponent who recently defected from the MCP. The message is intended for a wider audience and it is clear anyone supporting multi-partyism will be made to pay...
Banda agrees to single ballot box
HARARE: Malawi's main opposition group has dropped its threat to boycott next month's referendum on multi-party politics after President Kamuzu Banda approved a new voting system.

Mofe Mwasha of the Public Affairs Committee said the opposition welcomed Banda's acceptance of the use of a single ballot box instead of the government's two boxes — one for "yes" and one for "no" — in the June 14 vote.
Court's ruling challenges Banda

By CHRIS MCGREAL

ISSUING an unprecedented challenge to the repressive regime of Malawi's life president, Hastings Kamuzu Banda, the high court has awarded the country's longest serving political prisoner substantial compensation for false imprisonment.

Before his release a year ago, Machipsa Munthali spent 27 years in jail for plotting against Banda's government. The court ruled that he should have been freed in 1973 on completion of his sentence, but was illegally detained. It awarded Munthali 4.5-million kwacha (about $137.5-million).

The ruling challenges the legality of the Preventive Detention Act under which hundreds of Banda's opponents have been held without trial for offences ranging from questioning the official assessment of the president's age (the government says he is 87, the records suggest he is 94) to wielding too much influence inside the ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP). This is viewed as a challenge to Banda's leadership.

The ruling is a further embarrassment to Banda in the run-up to next month's referendum on the future of Malawi's one-party state. The courts have recently overturned bans on opposition newspapers and the president was forced to abandon a scheme to use two ballot boxes — for those voting for and against the one-party-state in the referendum — which independent observers warned opened the way to intimidation and fraud.

Munthali, 68, was arrested on weapons charges during Banda's purge of dissidents in the MCP in 1965, a year after independence. He was tortured during his initial imprisonment and chained in a damp, windowless cell measuring two metres by one metre at the notorious Mkuwu prison near Zomba in southern Malawi.

"They kept me on the condemned block," he said on his release. "Even if they are not going to kill you, they are going to kill these around you and that is very hard."

When Munthali was released from prison last June, the police handed him a letter to sign thanking Banda for letting him go. He said he would rather go back to his cell. He was freed anyway, with a warning not to cause trouble. Munthali defied the order by joining the campaign for an end to one-party rule.

On Banda's announcement that he had dropped his insistence on separate ballot boxes in the referendum, Malawi's main opposition groups backed off a threat to boycott the plebiscite. But they warned that, while it will be harder to commit fraud, intimidation continues.

Last week, Amnesty International warned that regulations to protect free speech during the campaign were "deeply flawed and ineffective."

"Those who do speak out for multi-party democracy are likely to face human rights violations," Amnesty said. "Unless the government takes urgent steps to guarantee basic human rights, the referendum cannot be considered fair." - The Guardian
Banda snubbed by high court

MALAWI's high court has issued an unprecedented challenge to the regime of "President for Life" Hastings Banda by awarding the country's longest-serving political prisoner substantial compensation.

Before his release a year ago Machinisa Munthali spent 27 years in jail for plotting against Dr Banda's government. The court ruled that he should have been freed in 1973 on completion of his sentence and awarded him 4.5 million kwacha (about £750,000).

The ruling challenges the Preventive Detention Act under which hundreds of Dr Banda's opponents have been held without trial for offences ranging from questioning the official assessment of the president's age (the government says he is 87, the records suggest he is 94) to wielding too much influence inside the ruling Malawi Congress Party. This is viewed as a challenge to Dr Banda's leadership.

A referendum next month will decide whether Malawi will continue as a one-party state.

Malawi Referendum

Causes of Confusion

South Africa - Zaire

Malawians in pre-dawn poll rush

BLANTYRE (Malawi) — Malawians turned out in their thousands before dawn today to vote in a referendum on democracy that could end almost 30 years of one-party rule by Life President Kamuzu Banda.

A line of excited people almost a kilometre long waited outside one polling station in central Blantyre for it to open at 6am. Some said they had slept there all night.

Cheering people gave the V-for-victory and clenched hands signs of an opposition alliance campaigning for a Western-style democracy.

"We are going to vote multiparty, we have suffered a long time. We are cheerful now because things are going to change," said office messenger Wilson Mbilu.

Banda has ruled in autocratic style since independence from Britain in 1964.

Chaos

He is fighting to retain the one-party state, saying party politics has brought chaos to the rest of Africa.

He was forced into the referendum by internal unrest and a withdrawal of all but humanitarian assistance from Western donors protesting against human rights abuses.

A big turnout is believed to favour the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) and the United Democratic Front (UDF) in their battle against the ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP).

There was no immediate word from rural areas, home for 85 percent of the people of this tiny southern African nation.

Analysts say the peasants are more conservative than townspeople and more subject to intimidation against change.

In a radio address to the nation, Banda, officially 87 but widely believed to be in his mid-90s, appealed to 4.2 million registered voters over the age of 21 to cast their ballots peacefully. He said every Malawian should "be left to vote freely and without fear."

The European Community has protested to the government over reports of intimidation and harassment of voters by the MCP.

Opposition leaders, denied equal access with the government to the media, say the referendum campaign was not free but they were willing to press ahead regardless in response to a groundswell for change.

Aleke Banda, an opposition leader who was jailed for 12 years, says the president is boxed in by world opprobrium and internal revolt.

Aleke Banda is a leader of the Alliance for Democracy, headed by trade unionist Chakuwa Chihana, who was freed on Saturday after six months in jail for sedition.

Aford is campaigning for a multiparty vote with the United Democratic Front led by fired Minister Bakili Muluzi.

In the event of a victory, the opposition wants a government of national unity set up within a week to draw up a democratic constitution and a Bill of Rights and to lead the nation to elections before the year-end.

The government has pledged to honour the result.

FEARS OF INTIMIDATION AS MALAWSIANS VOTE

The government has been accused of using intimidation, violence and threats to suppress opposition candidates and voters. According to opposition leaders,

"The government has been using all means at its disposal to suppress our candidates and votes. Our campaigns have been disrupted, our rallies have been banned and our supporters have been targeted."

Opposition leaders have called for a peaceful election and urged their supporters to vote freely. However, the government has dismissed these allegations, saying that the elections will be free and fair.

"We have always held fair and free elections. This will be no exception. We will ensure that all candidates and voters have the right to participate peacefully."

The election is scheduled for July 28, and the international community is closely monitoring the situation to ensure that the election is free and fair.

SA-Maputo crime arms clamp planned

By Chris Whitfield Political Correspondent

CAPE TOWN — South Africa and Mozambique have struck a far-reaching deal aimed at stemming the flow of weapons into South Africa and clamping down on organised car theft and drug smuggling between the countries.

Swaziland will also be involved in a “Trilateral Crime, Security and Border Co-ordination Monitoring Committee” — the first in the region.

In a joint statement after a meeting in Cape Town yesterday, Law and Order Minister Hermus Kriel and Mozambique’s Internal Affairs Minister Manuel Jose Antono described the pact as a major breakthrough. They said it was aimed at including the entire southern African region.

In terms of the deal, the following crimes have been identified as a top priority: organised arms smuggling, the organised drugs trade, organised car theft, and syndicates involved in other serious crime.

The trilateral monitoring committee will deal with training of special investigation units for certain crimes, training border staff in search techniques, and improving existing relations between the police forces in the three countries.

Both Ministers agreed that the extradition of criminals should receive the highest priority.

The statement said Kriel would meet his Swazi counterpart “in the near future” on the strategy. “However, to be effective, this plan will have to be extended to countries in the sub-region and further north.”

“It has now become clear that arms smuggling and other serious cross-border crimes have reached such serious proportions that they can only be dealt with on an international basis,” the statement said.

Three Mozambicans who were arrested near Komatiport, in the eastern Transvaal, on Sunday, allegedly in possession of four ground-to-air missiles, are expected to appear in court today, reports Sapa.

Two of men are alleged to be Frelimo soldiers, the third a former Frelimo soldier. They apparently crossed the border from Mozambique into South Africa.

Banda ‘trailing at polls’

BLANTYRE — Pro-democracy forces claimed a huge lead in initial vote-counting in Malawi’s referendum on one-party rule early today.

The United Democratic Front (UDF), which is fighting President Kamuzu Banda, said that with about one-third of possible votes counted, their side had 69 percent and the ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP) 11 percent.

UDF monitors taking part in counts at polling stations reported 1.3 million votes for multiparty democracy against 160,000 for continued single-party rule by 1 am today. About 4.5 million voters over the age of 21 are registered.

The UDF said their unofficial figures showed landslides for their side in the northern and southern regions. But the MCP was leading in the central region by 71 percent to 25 percent, they said.

When polling stations closed yesterday, both sides were claiming that victory was within their grasp.

The official result is expected later today — Sapa-Reuters.

Malawi votes on multiparty rule

BLANTYRE — Tens of thousands of Malawians, some voting for the first time in their lives, turned out yesterday for a referendum on introducing multiparty politics after 30 years of single-party rule.

Well before dawn, hundreds of people lined up at voting stations here in the economic capital, the country's biggest city with 400,000 residents.

The atmosphere was calm and good humored, as women with babies on their hips mingled patiently with civil servants wearing ties. There were a few uniformed police at the voting stations, but no sign of any major security force presence.

"Today we are going to kill the black cockerel," said one voter, referring to the emblem used by the Malawi Congress Party of President Kamuzu Banda. "For the first time in Malawi, we are voting with our hearts," he added.

Many voters in Blantyre said openly they wanted to change the system, but political observers were unsure how the country's 8.5 million population lives in rural areas and is used to life under organizations run by the sole legal party and its Young Pioneers loyal to Banda.

From Mzuzu in the north, Aaron Longwe of the Alliance for Democracy said that there was a big turnout in the region. There had been no incidents, everybody was in a good mood "and making jokes about the death of the cockerel," he said.

Diplomats in the administrative capital Lilongwe reported a big turnout there too. Many firms and most offices closed down for the day. Stores in central Blantyre stayed open, with staff voting early in the day.

Government officials, members of opposition parties, and international observers were supervising the referendum at each voting station. About 4.2 million are eligible to vote. Full results were not expected before today, to be announced in Lilongwe by Malawi University vice-chancellor Brown Chirumbwa. He is chairman of the national referendum commission.

Banda, believed to be in his 90s, was proclaimed life president in 1971 and has ruled the small former British protectorate in southeast Africa since independence in 1964.

For most of that time, nothing seriously challenged his rule and personality cult. But in the past few years, pressure mounted from donor countries irritated by human rights violations and reports of torture and political assassination.

Television does not exist in Malawi, and the radio is in government hands. But the advocates of a change to the one-party system have been supported by the emergence of an independent press, with no fewer than 17 titles appearing since the announcement of the referendum barely six months ago.

ISTANBUL — George Soros and Sir James Goldsmith, the influential investors who sparked the gold market to 28-month highs last month, are in the commodity for the long term, say leading gold analysts.

The massively wealthy, clout-carrying US investment funds also saw gold as a long-term stem in their portfolios, analysts at the Financial Times World Gold Conference said.

Although the gold price has stalled at around $370 an ounce recently and was set in London yesterday at $368.50, after climbing to $384.50 last month, 16% above the seven-year lows plumbed in March, the bull run was not necessarily over yet, the market experts said.

"I would be happy seeing prices in the $360s," said David Pryde, head of commodity trading at J P Morgan, New York. That would attract more liquidity to a market which had risen too fast and was correcting itself.

Omega Advisors' Frank Veneroso said "Soros is not in gold for the short term. If he was he would not have bought 13.5% of Newmont (Mining from Goldsmith). That is now a registered stock which he has to hold for six months. For a short-term investment he would have bought 9%.

Goldsmith invested part of his sale of Newmont stock in gold options. Pryde noted that while some investors had taken profits, they would have an investment in gold that they would use for trading and a "core" investment for the long term.

"Mine supply has increased on average by 1.7% a year over the past two decades," he said. "Meanwhile, the Far East has seen the fastest growth in the economic world, averaging 9% a year against a Western average of about 2%. And the Far East consumes 10 times as much gold per unit of income as anywhere else."

The gold supply-demand balance is in deficit of more than 500 tons this year, according to Gold Fields Mineral Services' Gold 1993 survey.

Further, it is unlikely that the market will see much additional supply from mine-company forward sales.

BLANTYRE. — Malawi opposition leader Mr Chakuftwa Chihana, buoyed by claims of victory over one-party rule in a referendum, yesterday demanded that Life President Kamuzu Banda move aside and appoint him executive prime minister.

Computing about one-third of possible ballots, the United Democratic Front (UDF) said that it and Mr Chihana’s Alliance for Democracy (AFORD) had polled about 70% of the vote nationwide in favour of multi-party politics.

Mr Chihana, 52, freed from jail last Saturday after serving six months for sedition, told reporters Mr Banda should resign as life president of his Malawi Congress Party (MCP) and become the figurehead of a transitional coalition government to prepare for multi-party elections.

“He no longer has the support of the country. We will give him a smooth exit,” he said at his home in the capital, Lilongwe.

Opposition buoyed by referendum

“Banda should call on me as executive prime minister to form a council of ministers drawn from AFORD, the UDF and the MCP,” Mr Chihana said.

No reaction was available from the MCP or from the UDF, whose leader Mr Bakili Muluzi, a former minister, was widely expected to be a front-runner for leadership of a post-Banda Malawi.

If the opposition does win the referendum, its leaders are expected to demand the swift installation of a multi-party government to draw up a new constitution and arrange elections by the end of the year.

Mr Banda, however, is almost certain to resist such a swift transition from almost 30 years of one-party rule.

“The black cock is dead,” Mr Muluzi said.

Voters, thousands of them illiterate, had to choose between the MCP’s black cockerel symbol and the hurricane lamp of the pro-democracy alliance.

Mr Chihana, who has led a life of imprisonment and exile as a result of his opposition politics, declared “I have been vindicated.”

The UDF by midday yesterday was saying its unofficial monitors had totalled 794,000 votes for change against 300,000 for a continuing one-party state.

BLANTYRE — Malawians have decisively rejected the autocratic rule of President Hastings Kamuzu Banda and his Malawi Congress Party by voting overwhelmingly for multi-party democracy.

In the first test of public opinion since Dr Banda banned opposition parties in 1966, a huge 73.4 percent of those voting supported a switch to a multi-party system and only 26.6 percent voted for continued one-party rule.

This week's referendum, which was forced on Dr Banda by the withdrawal of aid from foreign donors critical of his policies, is a big setback for the man who has dominated Malawi for 30 years.

What will happen next is uncertain. Dr Banda is widely expected to call a general election, and the referendum outcome suggests that it would result in the defeat of the Malawi Congress Party and the end of his rule.

At least one opposition figure has called for the immediate installation of a government of national unity and the drafting of a new constitution before an election is held.

The news of the landslide for democracy in the referendum was greeted with delight in most of Malawi yesterday.

There was no immediate reaction from the government but Dr Banda is expected to make a statement soon.

Chakuwayo Chukwana, leader of the Alliance for Democracy (Aford), one of the groups that campaigned for multi-partyism, said his group would press for the installation of a government of national unity.

He said a new constitution should then be drawn up by a multi-party forum before a general election was held — preferably before the end of the year.

The referendum result was a personal vindication for Mr Chukwana, who has been imprisoned three times for advocating democracy in Malawi.

The voting in the referendum was orderly and there were no immediate allegations of large-scale irregularities.

The state-run Malawi News Agency quoted referendum chairman Brown Chimphamba as saying 1.39 million of the 3.1 million voters (44 percent) supported a multiparty democracy.

Thousands of people poured out of shops, offices and factories after the announcement at midday. Most flashed "V for victory" signs, the symbol of the opposition.

"We're on their side," said a police officer who clutched a baton in one hand and made a "V for victory" sign with the other.

Joy sweeps Malawi as poll results Bandara
Malawi held in thrall by Banda

FEW, if any, of Africa's dictators have measured up to the standards set by Hastings Kamuzu Banda — in egocentricity, in longevity both political and personal, or in wielding power.

For nearly 30 years, he has held in thrall Malawi's 8-million people. His arch-conservative demeanour and professed devotion to Christianity was the public face.

The private one was of a man who invoked African spirits to condemn enemies to damnation.

His biographer spent weeks interviewing elders in his birthplace, a village near Kasungu. They recalled that Banda was born during a tribal uprising in February 1893, which means that he would now be 94.

Having received a basic education from Church of Scotland missionaries, he continued his studies in the US. He studied history and political science, as well as medicine, eventually gaining a doctorate of medicine.

He established a thriving practice as a doctor in Harlestone, London.

As the winds of change swept through Africa, Banda became something of an icon to politicians, journalists and others interested in the future of the continent. His puritanism failed to prevent him being named as a co-respondent in a divorce suit brought by his English secretary's husband. Within a few months, Banda had closed his London practice and returned to Africa, establishing a small practice in Kumasi, in what was to become Ghana.

He was lured from this idyll by the burgeoning black nationalist movement in Nyasaland, mobilising to oppose the newly formed Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Inevitably, he came into contact with Sir Roy Welensky, federal premier, and soon joined that select band of African political jailbirds.

He served a year in Gwelo Prison in Southern Rhodesia before he was released.

Within a year of his return, as leader of the Malawi Congress Party, he had swept the polls. Within two years, Nyasaland seceded from the Federation and a year later the country became independent Malawi with Banda as prime minister. In 1966, Malawi became a republic. President Banda soon stamped his personal on every aspect of life.

Nothing happened without Banda getting to know about it.

Several opposition leaders died in mysterious circumstances.

A dictatorship it certainly was, but Malawi under Banda has worked. The people were relatively content — as long as they did exactly what they were told — Daily Telegraph.
I won't quit or hand over, says Banda

BLANTYRE — Malawi's President Kamuzu Banda said yesterday he accepted the result of this week's democracy referendum but said his authoritarian government would not resign or be replaced by an interim government.

He said Monday's two-to-one vote for multiparty rule presented voters with a choice of political systems but did not give the opposition the right to form a transitional government.

"The suggestion that this government or I should resign or be replaced by an interim government is out of the question and unacceptable," Banda said in an address broadcast on radio nationwide.

"What the people of Malawi have said in this referendum is that they want other political parties to be formed in this country to compete with the (ruling) Malawi Congress Party," Banda added.

It was his first public address since the results were announced by the Referendum Commission on Wednesday, showing 63 percent in favour of political pluralism.

Opposition leaders rejected Banda's statement, accusing him of clinging to power and "violating the spirit of the referendum.

"The referendum is the will of the people. Banda is trying to give himself the lease of life illegally," AFORD leader Chakufwa Chirwa told Reuters.

UDP secretary-general Harry Thomson added: "We are disappointed to hear the president come up with such a speech."

Banda has tolerated no opposition since declaring himself life president after Malawi gained independence from Britain in 1964 — Sapa-Reuters.
President Kamuzu Banda was defeated in this week's Malawi referendum. But, as JOE LATAGOMO reports, divisions in the opposition may enable Banda to make a political comeback.

The referendum in which Malawians decisively rejected President Kamuzu Banda's autocratic rule as a founder of multiparty democracy has left a number of uncertainties. Not the least is Banda's own future.

Though he was defeated in the referendum, this may not be the end for either Banda or his Malawi Congress Party (MCP). If Banda decides to call an immediate election, the multiparty campaigners may find that they do not have much else in common other than their desire for democracy. They might be so divided that Banda and the MCP could emerge victorious.

But for the moment not only Banda, but his closest allies, Minister of State John Tembo and the official hostess, Cecila Kadzewari, are generally believed to be the power behind the throne, must now consider their own options. Tembo was being widely tipped as the man most likely to succeed Banda.

Banda and Ivory Coast President Houphouet-Boigny are the last survivors of the African leaders who were swept into power by the departure of European colonialism.

The most recent of one to go was President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia. Julius Nyerere has gone. Kwama Nkrumah is long gone.

Now Banda, who is reputed to be well into his nineties, must face the prospect of either stepping down or being pushed out of power. Maleen opposition politicians hope he will not die in the former, lest he be further humiliated.

At least two factors led to Banda's defeat in the referendum and his possible downfall as a result:

- The country was haggling over on not reforming the economy, and particularly the bureaucracy, at independence. Responsibility was given to right expatriate workers and certain levels of the bureaucracy were said to be "white elephant's jobs."

- The moves alienated the black educated class, who had visions of post-colonial prosperity, viewing the bureaucracy as the enablers of the system that had been put into place.

At the height of the Cold War, Banda was seen by the West as strategically important. His government was seen as a protector of British interests in the region, as is evident by the strong voting in this region for the retention of the one-party system.

Banda became one of Africa's most ruthless and powerful rulers, holding, in addition to the Life Presidency, the portfolio of External Affairs, Works, Agriculture, Justice, Women's and Children's Affairs, and Community Development and Social Welfare.

His photographs appeared on women's dress material, it had to be displayed in government offices, his acolytes spoke in veneration of the work and — officially — he could do no wrong. Anybody who criticized him was seen to be hostile and punishment was swift and heavy.

Machipisa Mumbila, now 66 years old, received some of the worst treatment meted out to Banda's political opponents. Last month a court awarded him the equivalent of 20 million in compensation for being jailed for 27 years, 20 of them illegally.

Orton Chiroww, one of Mumbila's contemporaries, was not so lucky. He died in prison after he and his wife Vera had been kidnapped in Zambia and jailed in Malawi. Mrs Chiroww may yet emerge from jail to celebrate what the death of her husband, and others, has helped to achieve for her country.

In 1979, Banda admitted that a parliament was not part of the constitution, a move that resulted in the formation of various alliances in exile.

Among these was Chakwera Chaman's Alliance for Democracy, which spearheaded the campaign that led to the referendum this week. Chaman was himself jailed for six months when he returned to Malawi.

After the referendum Chaman suggested that he be appointed interim executive prime minister, a proposal that was not well received in the ranks of the United Democratic Front and other multiparty campaigns.

Kamuzu Banda's second fatal mistake was his failure to read the message evident at the end of the Cold War. At the height of the East-West rivalry, he was seen by the West as strategically important and a blind eye was turned to his abysmal human rights record. When the aid taps were turned off at the end of the Cold War, Banda began to realize the consequences of the demand for democracy.

The outcome of the referendum makes a general election inevitable. Opposition groups are demanding a government of national unity first, but some observers think Banda might call an election soon to outdo an ideologically divided opposition.

More than a million Malawians voted in effect for Banda's MCP in the referendum. Assuming that all of the opposition groups have an equal share of support among the remaining 2 million voters, it is unlikely that any of them would win convincingly in a general election.
Victorious Malawians demand an interim govt

BLANTYRE — Malawi opposition leaders are demanding that an interim government be formed within the next seven days, in the wake of Monday’s referendum which ended one-party rule.

Moses Msula, spokesman for the Public Affairs Committee, an umbrella body for all the main opposition groups in the country, said the ruling Malawi Congress Party government had to be removed quickly and replaced with an interim one.

His group would push for this at a meeting with the president’s committee on dialogue today.

The meeting was expected to be attended by representatives of the opposition Alliance for Democracy, United Democratic Front, church organisations, the business community and lawyers.

Msula said the Congress Party could not be trusted to implement the changes from single-party to multi-party rule.

Since the release of the referendum results on Wednesday, Life President Kamuzu Banda has not publicly acknowledged his defeat.

An unnamed government official said yesterday the government accepted the results of the referendum.

But Msula said Malawians wanted to hear directly from Banda himself.

A total of 67% voted Malawi’s 4.7-million people cast their votes on Monday, and the “yes” vote won by 63% — Sapa-APF.

Malawian 'yes' to democracy

Weekly Mail Reporters and Sapa

MALAWIAN opposition leaders demanded presidential and parliamentary elections before Christmas after President Kamuzu Banda's one-party rule had been trenched in a referendum this week.

The two leading opposition groups, the Alliance for Democracy and the United Democratic Front, called on Banda to form a coalition government of national unity or to resign.

Some suggested he could serve as a ceremonial figurehead to the coalition government. Others were not as conciliatory, and demanded that he install a government of national unity within seven days to draw up a democratic constitution and prepare for a general election.

The government has rejected a coalition leadership, saying it will remain in power until elections.

Under the constitution, the next national elections are due only in 1997.

Referendum chairman Brown Chimphamba said 64 percent of the country's 3.1 million voters had voted "No" to one-party rule. The referendum asked Malawians if they preferred the one-party system Banda has enforced since 1964 or multiparty democracy.

Foreign donors pushed Banda into the referendum when they halted all but humanitarian aid to Malawi. Almost $70 million in aid money was frozen this year. The Malawian opposition wants donors to keep up the pressure until an election is announced. Banda has also freed hundreds of political prisoners and legalized opposition political movements. Trade unionist and head of the opposition alliance Chakufwa Chikana was released only this week.

Overjoyed Malawians danced in the streets as they chanted "multi-party, multi-party" and flashed "V-for-victory" signs.

Malawian opposition leaders claimed a substantial victory after voters turned out in droves to decide the fate of Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda's one-party rule.

With about a quarter of the vote counted, returns were overwhelmingly in favour of democracy. In some places more than 90 per cent voted against continued one-party rule, although the results from crucial rural areas were still not in.

In Blantyre, Malawi's largest city, people began queuing at 4am to vote in the referendum on introducing a multi-party democracy. By breakfast time, two lines extended for more than a mile from the main polling station to the city's outskirts.

Dr Banda, Africa's longest-serving dictator, made a final plea for support: "Don't you want your Kamuzu to rule? Then show those people you don't want anybody but your Kamuzu."

The government newspaper also appealed for a "Vote for Black Cock", the symbol of the Malawi Congress Party (MCP), in preference to independence from Britain 29 years ago. "People are tired of the old regime," said McPherson Gondwe, who was born the same year Dr Banda came to power. "People want change."

Although the vote will decide whether to legalise opposition parties, it is mainly a test of the MCP's standing. There has been little debate about democracy. Instead, the vote will turn on a weariness with repression, corruption and poverty.

But while the cities and semi-urban areas appear overwhelmingly in favour of a multi-party system, more than four out of five Malawians live in villages. It is there that the issue will be decided.

On the Thunga tea plantation, owned by Lumbo, where workers earn about 50 pence a day, observers concluded the vote would be for democracy. At Nansato, polling was at the local school, where children sit on the floor because there is no money for desks. The headmaster, Michael Michembo, also thought the vote would be for democracy.

In rural areas, where the traditional authority of village chiefs is still strong and dissent is most difficult, multi-party advocates cannot be so certain of victory. Government intimidation brought warnings from the 200-strong international monitoring team.

In the cities, the MCP focused on harassing opposition activists, but in the countryside, whole communities were targeted. Some villagers were warned they might lose their land if the vote swung the wrong way. Rumours were spread of a "magic eye", or hidden camera, inside polling booths.

But it may not have been enough. In Mikonde village, few people lined up at the polling booth in a field would say how they voted.
Malawians await talks on poll

BLANTYRE — Malawian opposition leaders entered talks with the government yesterday to thrash out differences over what their referendum victory means for the country's political future.

Life president Dr Kamuzu Banda accepted the outcome of the referendum, which showed 63% support for an end to one-party rule, but he refused to resign.

He has, however, promised a change to the country's constitution and elections within a year.

He said: "The suggestion that this government or I should resign or be replaced by an interim government is out of the question and unacceptable."

"What the people of Malawi have said is that they want other political parties to be formed in this country to compete with the (ruling) Malawi Congress Party."

But Mr Chakufwa Chihana, leader of the opposition Alliance for Democracy, said: "Dr Banda is trying to cling to power despite his rejection by the people."

Mr Chihana demanded the establishment of an interim government of national unity within seven days of the referendum result.
Banda's opponents keep up the pressure

BLANTYRE — Ignoring President Kamuzu Banda's refusal to step down in view of his defeat in the democracy referendum, Malawi's opposition groups yesterday repeated their demand for an immediate transitional government.

The opposition parties submitted their demand at a meeting in Blantyre with the President's Committee, which consists of Cabinet Ministers and senior government officials.

The aged president said in a national broadcast yesterday that he accepted the result of Monday's referendum, in which Malawians voted two-to-one for multiparty democracy rather than continue with the unchallenged rule that Banda's Malawi Congress Party has maintained for the past 30 years.

AFRICA NEWS SERVICE

However, Banda said this did not require him to resign or his government to make way for a transitional government.

Instead, the constitution would be changed to allow for multiparty democracy, and arrangements would be made for an election.

The opposition groups rejected Banda's statement and accused him of trying to hold on to power against the expressed wishes of the people.

When they repeated their demand for a transitional government to rule pending the amendment of the constitution and a general election at yesterday's meeting, the government representatives said they would convey this to Banda.

Banda moves to delay democracy

By FRED BRIDGLAND in Blantyre

"Anyone who interprets it in this way is wrong. The suggestion that the government or I should resign is out of the question and unacceptable."

Dr Banda said he would soon recall the single-party parliament, in which he appoints all MPs, to amend the constitution to give legal status to opposition parties and allow for multi-party elections.

He hoped these would take place within a year.

But the opposition, falling under an umbrella body called the Public Affairs Committee, wants the elections to be held within six months.

"After 31 years of dictatorial power, the Malawi Congress Party can't introduce a new democratic system of government without our input," said Harry Thomson, secretary-general of the United Democratic Front, one of the main opposition groups.

"They cannot continue in power as though nothing has changed. They cannot be both referee and player in the introduction of a new system."

The opposition has threatened to call a mass campaign of civil disobedience and industrial action in pursuit of its demands.

Shortly after taking office in 1964, Dr Banda outlawed all opposition parties. Then, in 1971, he appointed himself President for Life and moved to crush all those who criticized his rule.

But a vocal campaign for democracy has been growing since March 1982, when Roman Catholic bishops issued a pastoral letter condemning Dr Banda's human rights record.

Malawian exiles and critics also formed a front to push for change.

The decline set in further two months later when up to 38 people reportedly died in riots which followed labour strikes in the worst anti-government unrest since Dr Banda came to power. — The Telegraph, London
Police ban Malawi rally

BLANTYRE — Malawi police cancelled a big opposition rally yesterday, to the fury of thousands of multi-party advocates who had converged at a stadium here in the wake of a referendum that backed multiparty democracy.

Supporters of the opposition United Democratic Front, gathered at the stadium for the rally, said that four heavily armed policemen arrived at the stadium and told the UDF officials that the rally could not proceed.

Fury as rally in Blantyre is banned

BLANTYRE — About 20,000 Malawians who had gathered for a pro-democracy rally were dispersed yesterday by four policemen.

The huge crowd left in anger after converging on a Blantyre stadium for an event organised by backers of multiparty democracy.

Some had travelled up to 300 km for the rally.

Supporters of the opposition United Democratic Front (UDF), who had gathered early at the stadium, said four "heavily armed policemen" arrived and told the UDF officials that the rally could not proceed because the police commissioner had not issued a permit.

When it was announced on the public address system that the much-publicised rally had been cancelled, many started trudging out of the Nyambadwe stadium, but some remained for a few minutes, shouting abuse at the police and chanting "To hell with Banda We want change!"

Bevis Swula, an accountant and member of UDF, said: "I have never been annoyed to this extent. You have never seen a war in Malawi but this time you are going to see it."

A member of the UDF executive, Zillio Chipambo, said the government was trying to provoke people to turn violent so that it could take any measures it wanted to fore the process of change about to take place.

"Some said the police had "actually threatened to open fire if people did not disperse". "Most Malawians have not seen firearms before and the moment they see a gun they run for their lives," said a polytechnic student, Charles Likambale. "Despite the fact that we voted last week for multiparty politics, we haven't changed, not even an inch. We are still under Banda's ruthless ruling," he said.

Likambale questioned why the police let the Malawi Broadcasting Corporation run the announcement about the rally for nearly 12 hours before cancelling it.

Malawi to scrap one-party clause

Malawi opposition aims to topple Banda

BLANTYRE — The victorious opposition in Malawi's democracy referendum is planning a campaign of mass civil disobedience and strikes to topple the regime of Life President Hastings Banda if he continues refusing to countenance a transition to democracy.

The Rev Malheme Chande, a leading member of the Public Affairs Committee, the umbrella organisation of Banda's opponents, said "We will be telling people to refuse to go to work until we have brought this government to its knees. We will tell the donor countries not to resume aid and we will ask the UN to bring Banda to his senses."

But the opposition overwhelmingly backed by voters last week in a referendum on the 30-year-old one-party system — has certainly been shocked out of its victory euphoria by Banda's rejection of one of its main demands — that an all-party transitional government of national unity be established to organise, by December, the country's first general election in more than 30 years.

In a speech on government-owned Malawi Radio, Banda, 56, who also likes to be called "NKwazi" (Conqueror), said "The suggestion that the government or I should resign, to be replaced by an interim government, is out of the question."

Government and opposition negotiators failed to resolve the dispute at a Blantyre meeting on Friday but government strong man John Tembo did agree to set up a meeting to negotiate with Banda and opposition leaders this week to head off the crisis.

However, in an ominous development for the government, two companies of 250 men of the Malawi Rifles — part of a 30,000-strong army which until now has stayed firmly above politics — marched fully armed through the Blantyre working-class suburb of Ndirande in support of a transition to multiparty democracy.

Meanwhile, pressure is mounting from various parties, among them Machinza Munthali, known as "Malawi's Mandela" for the 27 years he spent in prison for opposing Banda.

Munthali, 57, and on the executive of the Alliance for Democracy, one of the main groups operating under the opposition umbrella, said Banda had put opposition leaders in an impossible position. After last week's street celebrations, they could hardly now tell the people that the victors of the referendum by a two-thirds margin would be allowed no part in an interim government.

"It would be seen as a great betrayal," said Munthali, who saw scores of Banda's opponents go past his cell to the gallows.

Harry Thomson, secretary-general of the United Democratic Front, another of the opposition groups, under the opposition umbrella, said: "They cannot continue in power as though nothing has changed. After a referendum result like this, there can be no compromise on our demand for the installation of an interim government." — Daily Telegraph
BLANTYRE — The Malawi government and its opposition has agreed to form a parallel caretaker government in the form of an executive council, averting the risk of mass violent protest.

A spokesman for the opposition Alliance for Democracy, the Rev Aaron Longwe, said yesterday that at a meeting on Monday the two sides had agreed to form a National Executive Council (NEC) which would have control over the parliament.

The opposition had originally demanded ministerial powers.

A committee of seven government representatives and seven opposition members had been appointed to work out the technical responsibilities of the NEC. A national consultative council has also been formed to advise the NEC, Mr Longwe said.

The meeting on Monday between the Public Affairs Committee, representing all the opposition forces in the country, and the Presidential Committee on Dialogue also agreed that parliament would sit next Tuesday to repeal a section of the constitution to legalise the formation of other political parties — Sapa-AFP.

Amnesty for Malawi exiles

HARARE — Malawi’s late president, Kamuzu Banda, yesterday declared an amnesty for thousands of political exiles, inviting them to return home for the first democratic elections since independence 29 years ago.

The announcement, reported the official Malawi News Agency, came two days after Banda’s Malawi Congress Party and opposition groups formed a joint committee to run the country until the presidential and parliamentary elections later this year.

Malawian voters last week rejected Banda’s one-party rule in a referendum, demanding a Western-style democracy.

Afterwards, Banda spurned calls for him to resign and form a coalition government, but promised democratic elections.

Malawi’s parliament meets on Tuesday to repeal clauses in the constitution outlawing opposition parties.

Those laws were temporarily lifted to allow campaigning for last week’s referendum.

The main opposition groups, the Alliance for Democracy and the United Democratic Front, have offered to make Banda a ceremonial head of state.

Angolan food aid flights halted

SAO TOME — The Angolan government said yesterday it was stopping relief flights to the rebel-held city of Huambo until Unita allowed relief flights to three besieged towns held by the government.

Social Affairs Minister Norberto dos Santos told state radio that Unita had refused to let the UN World Food Programme (WFP) fly food and medicines to the besieged towns of Cuito, Menongue and Malanje until next week.

The government had therefore decided to suspend authorisation for relief flights to Huambo until aid could be flown into these towns, he added.

Diplomats say Unita is close to taking Cuito and Menongue, two provincial capitals on the fringes of the central highlands.

They have been under siege for nearly six months.

Unita accused the Angolan government of trying to use food aid as a political weapon.

The Malawian government and opposition have agreed in principle to a parallel administration with joint control over the cabinet and parliament after the ruling party's defeat last week in the referendum on one-party rule.

A deal was struck after the opposition backed off from its demand for seats in the cabinet, perceiving the advantages of sharing power without accountability.

The government agreed on Friday to a demand by one of the two main opposition groups, the Alliance for Democracy (Aford), for jointly overseeing the cabinet and parliament through two councils.

Under the scheme, a national executive council would have effective control of ministries, while a national consultative council would draft a new constitution. Its decisions would be binding on the one-party parliament.

A second opposition group the United Democratic Front (UDF) had insisted on power sharing within the cabinet. The talks became deadlocked on Friday night, but by next morning, the UDF leadership had revised its demands.

The opposition would effectively have joint control of the government without the same responsibilities, distancing itself from an unpopular administration in the run-up to the first free elections in nearly three decades.

The powers of Life President Hastings Kamuzu Banda would technically remain undiminished. He would retain the authority to rule by decree. But the coming days will test the government's resolve in tackling the opposition. The two sides will meet in the next week to decide the level of representation for each party and the terms on which agreement would be reached within the committees.

The government has promised to recall parliament next week to amend the constitutional ban on multi-party politics and other restrictions on basic freedoms. The two sides have also agreed on a committee to look into the workings of the Malawi Broadcasting Corporation (MBC). The opposition says the government has already launched an unofficial election campaign on the radio — since there is no television in Malawi.
Political exiles get amnesty

BLANTYRE — Malawi's President Kamuzu Banda has declared a general amnesty for thousands of political exiles with immediate effect, the state-run radio reported yesterday.

A statement by his office quoted by radio said Banda was inviting them to return home to join in the political process before the first democratic general elections expected within a year.

Malawians voted overwhelmingly in a referendum last week to reject Banda's one-party rule set up after 1964 independence from Britain. The parliament meets next Tuesday to repeal a constitutional clause outlawing opposition parties and declaring the country a one-party state.

Thousands of Malawians went into exile to escape Banda's iron-fisted rule which came under fire for human rights abuses by Western donors who forced him to hold the referendum by withdrawing all but humanitarian assistance.

One-man Banda

MALAWI'S PEOPLE may congratulate themselves for deposing their dictator and voting to reverse his one-party, one-man rule. After decades of repression, Hastings Banda has been pushed into easing his control by age, by the changing political map of southern Africa and by international pressure. It is better late than never — though much too late for the thousands of Malawians killed and tortured by this regime. But western countries must refrain from self-congratulation: Dr Banda should and could have been repudiated many years ago.

The stock epithets until recently tell the tawdry tale: Banda was widely portrayed as "pro-western" and a "staunch anti-communist" who had stamped his authority on Malawi with a "highly individual style". On his state visit to Britain in 1985 the Queen praised Malawi's farming achievements, while Mrs Thatcher described Malawi as a model for the rest of Africa. Four years later Mrs Thatcher paid her return visit amid indications that she would not think of following up Amnesty International's reports on detention without trial. It was only two years ago that Britain halved its aid to Malawi because of its human rights record and urged the release of political prisoners. In yet another report, Amnesty said last year that detainees suffered "deliberate cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment".

Dr Banda, who rarely admits to internal opposition, replied that if exiled dissidents returned to Malawi, they would become "meat for crocodiles". Last October the ordeal of Orton and Vera Chirwa — opposition barristers who had been kidnapped in Zambia in 1981 — came to its tragic end when Orton died in prison and his wife was finally released. She had seen her husband once before his death. By this time Dr Banda was showing increasing signs of disorientation in the new atmosphere where fear was no longer an adequate weapon. In January this year, 30,000 demonstrators supported an opposition meeting, while just four people turned up for a ruling party rally. After the western aid suspension in April 1992, more prisoners had been released and Dr Banda conceded the referendum.

Linking aid to human rights and to Mr Hurd's principle of "good governance" has become much easier in the new international climate. But years of neglect only make a smooth emergence into democracy much more difficult now, even if Dr Banda finally concedes the elections for which his people have voted. There are still opportunities for rigging and repression. And pressure must be maintained to ensure that Malawians do not fall into the hands of another baleful strong man.
Unita blocks bid to rescue foreigners

SAO TOME — The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) plans to send a second aircraft to evacuate foreigners from the rebel-held city of Huambo today, Angolan state radio said.

But the radio, monitored in the island state of Sao Tome and Principe, said the rebel movement Unita would not allow any nationals of Sao Tome or Cape Verde, who account for many of the foreigners left in Huambo, to board the flight.

The ICRC flew more than 100 evacuees from Huambo to Sao Tome on Thursday. Most were Portuguese and Angolans related to Portuguese residents in Angola, but the group also included four Brazilians.

An estimated 360 Portuguese and up to 200 other foreigners were trapped in Huambo, a city of half a million people in the central highlands, when it fell to Unita in March after a two-month battle.

A second evacuation flight was planned for Thursday, but this was cancelled after the first aircraft landed in Luanda due to technical problems and the evacuees were transferred to another aircraft to continue their journey to Sao Tome.

Unita accused the Angolan government of forcing the aircraft to land in Luanda for political reasons and ICRC officials said the evacuation programme would have to be renegotiated from scratch.

Seven parties for Malawi

LILONGWE — Seven political parties are being formed in Malawi to compete in the country’s first general elections in three decades.

The parties will contest 146 parliamentary seats, said the Rev Emmanuel Chinkwita, setting chairman of the loose alliance of opposition movements in Malawi, the Public Affairs Committee (PAC).

The Malawi parliament is scheduled to meet on June 29 in the former capital Zomba to revoke section 4 of the constitution, which enshrined one-party rule.

This will pave the way for the formation of other parties following a 53 percent victory for multipartyism in the June 14 referendum.

President Kamuzu Banda’s Malawi Congress Party (MCP) has been the sole ruling party since independence from Britain in 1964.

Malawi constitution set to be amended

BLANTYRE — The Malawian parliament met yesterday to revise the constitution in line with the huge vote in favour of a multiparty system in a referendum on June 14.

The main proposals are to revoke a clause which bans opposition parties and to adopt a Bill which spells out the rules and regulations for registering political parties.

These were among several draft laws submitted at the 168-member parliament early yesterday and a vote was possible later in the day, legislative sources said.

Malawi has been a one-party state under President Kamuzu Banda since soon after independence from Britain in 1964.

A third proposal would repeal the "Decency in Dress Law" of 1972, which forbids women from wearing trousers, and another would endorse the general amnesty which Banda declared for thousands of political exiles on June 23.

Banda has rejected the idea of an interim government, but has said that the constitution could be amended to allow for political pluralism and that full elections could be held within a year.

Malawi lets opposition register

LILONGWE — Malawi's parliament has revised the constitution to allow opposition parties to register following a referendum vote in favour of multi-party politics (170). Registering a party will now legally require at least 100 registered members to apply in writing to the registrar — a government official empowered to refuse or allow an application.

Parliamentary members from the ruling Malawi Congress Party made the amendment in their first sitting on Tuesday after life President Kamuzu Banda lost his bid to keep Malawi a single-party state in the June 14 poll.

The move followed angry scenes outside the building when opposition members and several journalists from the mushrooming independent Press were prevented from attending the sitting.

An official was later quoted as saying the opposition and journalists needed to seek advance clearance in order to enter parliament as observers.

Two bills were withdrawn without explanation on Tuesday. One was to legalise the formation of a national executive council, including opposition members, to monitor government activity until general elections were held in December.

The other was to repeal the Decency in Dress Act that forbids women from wearing short skirts or long trousers.

The Public Affairs Committee is also demanding the repeal of sections 6 and 9 of the constitution, which give supreme powers to Banda and recognise him as life president. — Sapa-AFP
Islamic scholar endorses killings

By Deborah Pugh CAIRO ONE of the world's leading Islamic scholars, Sheikh Muhammad Gha-azzali, has shocked Egyptians by effectively endorsing the extra-judicial killing of anyone who opposes the implementation of Islamic law, known as the Shariah.

Sheikh Ghaazzali's views were given while testifying at the trial of Islamic militants accused of murdering the Egyptian author, Fares Fouda.

They brought strong criticism this week from the Egyptian Organisation for Human Rights, which said that his testimony was "tantamount to the excommunication of a large section of Muslim society, as well as a clear invitation to murder. It is a legitimisation of the various acts of terrorism and violence that have afflicted this country in recent times".

Sheikh Muhammad Ghaazzali was called on to give evidence last week by the defence, which is attempting to prove that the accused were acting in accordance with Islamic law. When asked if someone who opposed the application of Islamic law was an apostate, Sheikh Ghaazzali told the court: "Yes, he is an apostate".

The Sheikh then went on to explain that the death penalty was generally accepted by Muslim jurists as the punishment for apostasy, but that it was carried out by the state, although he thought life imprisonment was sufficient.

Liberal Egyptians are concerned that the judiciary will accept the verdict of Sheikh Ghaazzali, who has received Saudi awards for his services to Islam and is extremely influential.

Malawians cry out for change from Banda regime

ROBIN HALLETT looks at Malawi and Haiti, and notes similarities between the oppressive regimes of Dr Hastings Banda and the late "Papa Doc" Duvalier

MALAWI, ever since achieving independence in 1964, has been the most buttoned-up country in Africa. A strict control was imposed on journalists entering the country. As a result, no country of its size has been so meagrely reported. Reports by Amnesty and the US human rights agency, Africa Watch, provided evidence of some of the abuses that were taking place, but there was never enough material to put these in a wider context.

Two years ago, Observer journalist, Julie Flint, visited Malawi as a tourist and wrote a brief article on her return. She said nothing more startling than could have been obtained by combing through old press cuttings and chatting to locals in hotels in Lilongwe, but her article caused a furore.

First an angry letter from the Malawian High Commissioner in London, then space allowed for an article by John Tembo, after the Life President the most important man in the country, under the headline, "Malawi — Oasis of Achievement in the Desert of the Third World". Finally, a week later a formal apology to the Life President himself.

These were in the days when the Observer was under the ownership of Lord Weidenfeld, and Lord Weidenfeld, as the Observer's critics gleefully pointed out, had extensive holdings in Malawi.

Andy Kershaw, a BBC reporter who recently visited Malawi, has compared the country with Haiti, a country he had also visited, and pointed to the similarities between Ngwazi, the honorary title of Life President Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda and "Papa Doc" Duvalier.

The comparison intrigued me, because for the first time in my life I had just had brief contact with Haiti.

I had the opportunity of meeting and listening to a remarkable Haitian, Charlotte Welsch, who had been minister of education in the government of Father Aristide, and who now runs an exile in the United States.

Haiti is a country with a remarkable, if deeply painful, history. Once the richest French colony in the West Indies, its people, most of them slaves of African descent, fought their war of liberation in the first decade of the 19th century and succeeded in maintaining a shaky independence during the long age of imperialism.

Francois Duvalier came to power in 1957 and ensured that his life presidency passed to his son, the 19-year-old Jean-Claude ("Baby Doc") after his death in 1971. The second Duvalier was forced to flee the country in 1986. There followed a confusing period of military rule until November 1990, when a charismatic 37-year-old Catholic priest, Father Jean-Bertrand Aristide, was elected president with 67% of the vote.

Aristide was known as a "priest to the poor". One of his first acts was to renounce his presidential salary. He ordered that Creole, the language of most Haitians, be set beside French, spoken mainly by the elite, as a national language. But when he attempted to prevent sections of the military from continuing their highly lucrative dealings in drugs, he provoked a mutiny which led to extensive bloodshed and his own escape.

Neither Immortal nor Invulnerable. Even if Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda retires gracefully, the people of desperately poor Malawi still face the most daunting problems only made possible by the intervention of the ambassadors of the great powers.

Haiti's present military regime is now under great pressure from both the United States and the Organisation of American States to allow Aristide to return.

Haiti is the poorest country in the Americas. Its people have suffered grievously from ruthless oppression. But the picture, as Sir John Readers painted it, is not entirely gloomy. Aristide has shown Haitians that things could be different. The military lack the means to be totally repressive. There is now a plethora of subsersive publications, like so many in the Soviet Union, and small groups of ordinary people come together clandestinely to discuss the situation.

So there is now in Haiti, as there is in Malawi and other parts of Africa, an element of hope. Those dreadful old autocrats have been shown to be neither immortal nor invulnerable. Even the most totalitarian of rulers can no longer ensure that his subjects are totally isolated from currents of opinion in the outside world.

The BBC World Service has been a not insignificant factor in creating the new mood in Malawi. Even Radio Free Europe was in the former Communist lands.

But even if — and it is a substantial if — Banda retires gracefully and Aristide is restored to power, the peoples of those two desperately poor countries will still face the most daunting problems. And yet a new factor, often ignored by economists, has been introduced into the situation — the openly expressed desire of millions of people for a better life. "We are tired, we want change" was the refrain Kershaw encountered and recorded everywhere he went in Malawi.

For once he had the feeling that one was listening to the authentic voice of the people.
The Founder's elite tree of knowledge

Kamuzu Academy, the Eton of Africa, was founded by the teacher who helped free his country from colonial rule. But, says Chris McGreel, it offers a classical English education and the students' native tongue is forbidden.

THROUGH her years submerged in battle with ancient Greece, Clara Magola never found time to visit the Kachere tree short walk across the Malawian bush. "The only thing I know that Kamuzu did his first years of school under the tree. The tree is quite old," the 18-year-old student said.

It would have to be old. The Kachere tree is a national monument to His Excellency the Late President of Malawi, Ngoni Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda's first contact with the alphabet at the turn of the century. Queen Victoria was still on the throne and the young Kamuzu Banda was one of her colonial subjects. He never recovered.

A few hundred yards from the Kachere tree stands the greatest monument to Dr Banda's obsession with himself and his obsession over his African roots and European education, the Kamuzu Academy. It is better known outside Malawi as the Eton of Africa, or Eton in the Bush.

The teachers dislike the name. They say it smacks of privilege when the intent is to provide a classical British boarding school education to the poorest Africans. But they cannot deny elitism. The 372 students are led a compulsory diet at Latin, ancient Greek, ancient history and other elements of a clausura. But every student sits 10 of GCSE exams, setting standards to rival any school. Last year two-thirds of the students got an "A" grade in ancient Greek. Only Africa is shut out from the curriculum and the academy.

Banda has said publicly he does not consider any Malawian fit to teach at the Kamuzu Academy. They do not have the education he has. Most of the teachers are British. The students are forbidden to speak their native mother tongues. They are taught of the Trojan Horse but not of Kenya.

The Kamuzu Academy is not the minor obsession of an outdated African dictator. Inside its walls can be found a microcosm of his rule. For 25 years he has run his country like his boarding school uniform, conformity and Banda knows best. No questioning is allowed. Defection for those who break the rules, no matter how illogical or arbitrary.

A bandula is torn between his African roots and the British society he was driven to embrace or remain a second-class citizen in his own land. He left at an early age to work the gold mines of South Africa. He did not return to what was then the British colony of Nyasaland for 43 years. By then he had qualified as a doctor in America, retrained in Edinburgh and set up practice in Liverpool. When he returned to help liberate his nation from colonial rule he was fluent in Latin but had forgotten his native Chichewa.

Banda views the academy as the modern equivalent of the Scottish Presbyterian missionary school that gave him his first educational leg-up. But it comes with the prejudices about the superiority of western culture instilled in him over the decades. He has described the £25 million a year spent on the school, the equivalent of about one half of the national education budget, as his personal gift to prepare future generations of Malawian leaders. But such leaders must be in his mould. He has often described himself as the most educated man in Malawi. "I'm old fashioned to me. One cannot understand European civilization without knowing the history and languages of the Greeks and Romans. One can discuss and fully appreciate problems of modern Europe and of many other countries if he knows nothing of the influence of the Romans and of the Greeks on European civilization. That is why I decided to establish the academy," Banda said on the school's 10th anniversary last year.

Banda is known at the school as H.E., as in His Excellency. The British headmaster, Antony Cooke, a modern languages teacher formerly at Churtelhouse, talked of him in reverential terms as the "Founder." The "Founder" is a total protagonist of western culture and you see from his dress and British style of speech that he believes it should be put to use where it is of benefit to Africa. It's a question of a small African country acquiring respect when it can relate to western countries. He speaks Latin fluently and frequently does when he comes here, or if we are honours by an audience, he speaks Latin.

The Kamuzu Academy is hidden at the end of a 20-mile dirt track through the central Malawian bush. The billowing orange dust gives way to a sharp turn on a tarmac road A bank, petrol station and post office, built at the same time as the school, marks the way to the centre of this little universe. The signs to 'Monument' target the Kachere tree. A few yards on, an arch and wrought iron gates loom large. As one peers through at the sprawling red brick school, Africa vanishes.

A small chapel is planted on the lush, cultivated lawns and there is a golf course. Behind an artificial lake is the library, loosely modelled on Washington's Library of Congress, and home to a dictionary signed by Ronald Reagan. The rugby fields might indeed be a piece of England.

Some new students arrive barefoot from distant villages to be introduced to detentions and houses, chess clubs and cricket, and chips and lunch.

Only the heat and the Malawian security guards snapping to attention shackle the illusion. The 35,000 candidates each year are nominated by state primary schools, whittled down by government exams and finally selected by the academy staff. Two boys are accepted for every girl, many on scholarships. The process is supposed to counter political influence and the children of some prominent Malawians have been turned away, even though the board of governors is dominated by the most powerful politicians in the country.

Some of the new students arrive barefoot from distant villages, to be fitted with green blazers adorned with the school crest, the Kachere tree. They are introduced to detentions and houses, chess clubs and cricket, and chips for lunch. On special occasions they wear straw boaters. When a young Malawian encounters the art master, former London comprehensive teacher Phil Simmonds, it is the African who must adjust. "Some are totally gosh-macked when they come here. I think that some came from a village they have never left before, it's the first time they've seen a white person, let alone a lawyer, used a knife and fork. Some of the girls weel down at my chair," he said.

And it's a beaten back Clara Magola is from Machunga a pre- tect, the head of her house and a chess club. She takes A-levels in ancient history, Latin and English literature. Her exams will be in English. Not permitted to study or speak her native tongue, Chichewa.

Chicewa is prohibited but we just do it illegally. If they catch you then they put you in detention. You know Africans tie things in their hair? Girls aren't allowed to do that here. The education is very good but it's not really worth learning ancient Greek I thought I would never use it. I was quite impressed by those who could At GCSE if you get a 'B' or above you have to do it for A-level. But I was lucky enough to get a 'C' in Greek and Latin."

History as world history. The headmaster says there is not much about Africa because it is not rele- vant to the British curriculum and the students are not interested. But Dennis Njako, 18, taking his GCSEs, would like to know more. "We don't want to go into Malawi history our- selves. They keep Africa away from us. We're not told the true history," he said. The other students fell into stunned silence. A few minutes later one came up to say that Denis was right but that he just doesn't know the curricu- lum is to criticise H.E.

The school's policy is not to adapt. After all these years it at least taught that Africans adapt to the school. There's some adaptation needed," Cooke asserted. "But looking, huge, difference between African students and teaching staff here. We don't really know about African culture. Whatever se- crets they share among themselves isn't our business. They know they have to adapt to the academy for term parties. There is contact among pupils without us being aware of what is said or thought, which is why they adapt back to their own culture. Many find that they would never give us the African culture but they are aware of it."

Most students are Malawi competitive they have to accept the demands made by western culture. The academy is supposed to expand horizons and the minds. The reasoning is that what the students learn is less important than teaching them to stretch the mind only goes so far. Students were discouraged from debating the recent selection of the school's coun- timor of the future of one party rule, which saw Banda heavily defeated last year. But he has been tactless to do so. It would have been bad manners to the installed ideology, to the academic employment or fund- ing those here," Cooke said. "The students showed very good devotion to their studies to the exclusion of other things. Some of the students thought differently but the debating society in any case had collapsed."

Japan: the land of the rising dirt

Guardian Weekly 9-15/11/1993

Citizens of the world’s strongest economy who vote in this month’s election will have to decide between the corrupt and the wise. Kevin Rafferty reports

WHEN Kochi Miyazawa became prime minister of Japan less than two years ago, it was supposed to mark the start of the country’s long wait for a new era. But Japan could become an international force to be reckoned with if the Liberal Democratic Party’s campaign, led by the new prime minister, is a success. The LDP has a clear lead in the opinion polls and the party is expected to win a majority of seats. The main opposition party, the Social Democratic Party, is expected to make a strong showing, but the LDP is likely to form the next government.

The Social Democratic Party (SDP) is a centrist party that has been in opposition since 1989. The party has a strong base in the business community, but it has not been able to attract a broad coalition. The LDP, on the other hand, has a strong base in the business community and has been able to attract a broad coalition. The LDP has also been able to attract a strong base in the rural areas of Japan, where the party has a strong base in the business community.

The LDP’s campaign has focused on the economy. The party has promised to reduce the budget deficit, improve the business environment, and attract foreign investment. The SDP, on the other hand, has promised to reduce the budget deficit, improve the business environment, and attract foreign investment. The SDP has also promised to increase the minimum wage and improve the healthcare system.

The campaign has also focused on the issue of corruption. The LDP has been accused of being corrupt, while the SDP has been accused of being reformist. Marina Benjamin explains why Jewish women are challenging orthodox attitudes

"BLESSED ARE you, Lord our God, King of the Universe, who has not made me a participant in the sordid affairs of this world. If my heart is true, I have no desire for this world. If my heart is true, I have no desire for this world. If my heart is true, I have no desire for this world. If my heart is true, I have no desire for this world. If my heart is true, I have no desire for this world. If my heart is true, I have no desire for this world."

Judais.

"Judais until now has been that of Jewish men, not of Jewish people," reform rabbi Sheila Shelah says. "In a recent poll, 84 percent of respondents said that they would support a woman as prime minister. But it is not just the idea of a woman as prime minister that is gaining ground. It is the idea of a woman in the highest office of the land that is gaining ground."

WOMEN are second-class citizens in orthodox Judaism. At root it is a matter of body politics. Women are despised on every level when they are menstruating: lest they contaminate prayer services or, with their allur- ing voices, disturb men’s concentra- tion, they are banished to the upper gallery. They may not sing in the main sanctuary, but they may do so in a side chapel.

The ferment of discontent among Jewish women has aroused concern at the Jewish Theological Seminary, which is a graduate school for rabbis. The seminary is the only rabbinical school in the United States that offers a master’s degree in Jewish studies. When he assumed office, Dr Sacks commissioned a national re- search to canvass women of all the denomina- tions on every aspect of Jewish life. The review inaugurates a decade of Renewal, he is com- mitted to breathing new life into the Jewish community — and is looking to women to get the ball rolling.

Jewish women are caught in a double bind, marginalised in the community if they are not wives and mothers, under excessive pressure to be perfect if they are The Chief Rabbi’s target of women is un- doubtably a complement to women’s societal role. It is no longer possible to imagine a woman as prime minister. But it is not just the idea of a woman in the highest office of the land that is gaining ground. It is the idea of a woman in the highest office of the land that is gaining ground."

It may be too late in February, a group of orthodox women affiliated to Stamineh Synagogue broke with tradition. They instigated women-only Sabbath prayer services.

Prayer group member Sharon Lee, inspired by the potential for change that the review has put on the community agenda, has been instrumental in organising the launch of the Jewish Women’s Network, inten- ded as a forum for dialogue be- tween Jewish women of every description who are attempting to improve their lot in Jewish life. As she sees it, "The debate is between loyalty to tradition and the dignity of women — every Jewish woman needs to think about her position in this debate."

If established religion refuses to flow with the tides of change, it jeopardises its own survival. It is a credit to Rabbi Sacks that, despite opposition from reactionary rabbis, he has been able to overcome the resistance of the Orthodox rabbis. Putting on a show for the girls

Eileen Summers on how a US gallery is introducing woman-on-canvases to man-on-the-street

The next time you are compiling a general knowledge quiz for a party or pub contest, try this one: What links the following women? Clara Peeters, Artemesia Gentileschi, Rosa Bonheur and Judith Leyster? Chances are, both teams will be stumped. The answer is that they were all artists of considerable distinction and repute in their respective times, between the 17th and 19th centuries, but man-in-the-street recognition has eluded them and all the other acknowledged first-rank women painters — Angelica Kauffmann, for example, and Elizabeth Vigée Le Brun, Kathie Kolowitz, Gwen John, Helen Frankenthaler, not for them the fame of a Leonardo, Titian or Rembrandt.

Twelve years ago, a Washington woman art-lover set out to redress the balance. Wilhelmia (Billie) Holladay gathered around her other women art lovers and, with the vital gift of the collection owned by Holladay and her husband, they have brought forth the superbly housed and endowed National Museum of Women in the Arts (NMWA). Located only a few blocks from the White House, it is maintained through an organisation of volunteers in every state, its supporters and patrons include Barbara Bush.

The museum is almost certainly the only one of its kind in the world. Its intent, according to Billie Holladay, "is not to separate art into male and female but to uncover and celebrate the hidden contributions of women in the arts." The NMWA's permanent collection contains more than 900 works by women artists from 29 countries, over 200 of them could find nothing about her. Yet a picture by this "unknown" 17th-century artist sold at Christie's in 1973 for £38,000.

Billie and her husband Wallace, a Washington architect and developer, decided to concentrate thereafter on women artists. Following her lead, the NMWA takes the position that, until fairly recently, the work of women artists has been downgraded if not actually ignored by a demonstrably male-dominated art establishment. "Even today, women artists are conspicuously under-represented in the major museums of the world," she says.

Billie Holladay believes the NMWA has played a major role in producing a turnaround — or at least the beginnings of one. "We have played a large part in the greater demand at auctions and elsewhere for works by women artists. The increased number of women included in group and solo exhibitions have been encouraged by our efforts, the ripple effect is reflected in the correspondence we receive."

Time magazine's art critic, Robert Hughes, appears to back those NMWA detractors who claim that art by women that is of museum quality is already hanging there. Yet support has come from the deputy curator for 20th-century art at New York's Metropolitan Museum, Lowery Sims. "The women's museum could find talent that might be overlooked," he explains. "So it's an exciting and interesting venture."

The director of the Museum of Contemporary Art in Los Angeles, Richard Koshalek, has reservations: "Museums have been very slow to respond to important artists who are women," he concedes, "but I don't know if the solution is to isolate artists in a woman's museum."

The NMWA has been housed, since 1987, in a repurposed, five-story building in downtown Wash.
Banda faces new challenger as Malawi presidential polls loom

BLANTYRE — Trade unionist Chakuwa Chihana, chairman of the Alliance for Democracy, has launched his campaign as Malawi's first opposition presidential candidate ahead of a poll expected in December.

Chihana (53) was released from prison on June 11 after serving nine months on charges of sedition.

He is affectionately called the "brave one" by admirers for openly coming home from neighbouring Zambia to challenge President Kamuzu Banda and sparking off a national referendum last month that backed the introduction of multiparty politics.

Chihana was arrested on his return on April 6 last year and tried for sedition in a case that generated international concern. His two-year sentence was subsequently reduced to nine months.

Chihana's campaign rallies have begun to draw the crowds, who have appeared moved by his attacks on Banda.

"Banda has been living on borrowed time and money and has squandered the opportunity to develop Malawi," he charged recently.

He said Banda's government had been preoccupied with constructing palaces in a country of grinding poverty.

"The main agenda of the Banda government has been to build a big house in the bush," Chihana declared at a rally in Lilongwe, apparently referring to a new palace that opened last year and is estimated to have cost the government about R150 million.

"How can one person with no child or wife have 13 state houses or palaces?" he asked.

Banda is a bachelor president but his companion for over 25 years has been official hostess Cecilia Kadzamira —

Malawi talks run aground

LILONGWE — Talks between the Malawi government and the opposition on the formation of two interim national councils to run the country until general elections have collapsed, opposition and government sources said Wednesday. It was unclear when the talks would resume.

Mass action was threatened by the opposition.
Banda frees ex-Minister

BLANTYRE—A former Minister in President Kamuzu Banda's Cabinet who was jailed for 22 years for sedition was released yesterday after pressure on the government by leaders of the southern region of the ruling Malawi Congress Party.

Gwanda Chakuamba was at one time considered a possible successor to Banda and was leader of the notorious Malawi Young Pioneers, the youth group that has terrorised opponents of the Banda regime.

He was held for 13 years in Zomba maximum security jail.

Chakuamba was expected to attend a welcome rally in his home town, Machinga, said a spokesman for the United Democratic Front, raising speculation that he had joined the opposition. — Star Africa Service.
adds the Malawi deposit must be rated “extremely high” against the Nafali north coast reserves. Maybe, but much water has to flow under the bridge before this project, or some others proposed for Mozambique, Tanzania and Madagascar, get off the ground.

The Malawi project is 560 km inland, competing projects are all on the coast. Transport of the beneficiated products to the nearest port — Nacala in Mozambique — is an additional cost. There is also the issue of available infrastructure in Malawi. Should the developers want to build a smelter on-site to produce titanium slag.

Stavrakis is adamant the infrastructure — labour, roads, fresh water and electricity — is there. The 10% corundum content, he says, could be critical for this project. The other southern African deposits do not contain this material, which is used in abrasives.

The project might eventually come to something, but, if investors in mineral exploration shares have learnt anything from their volatile performance over the past five years, it is to trade them. If you made a profit during SoPlats’ rise from 10c, then follow one of Woody Allen’s better pieces of advice: take the money and run.

Divisions among Malawi's opposition parties may ensure a continuation of Kamuzu Banda's long grip on his country — this time by popular consent. CAMIL DAYA reports from Lilongwe.

WHEN Malawians last month voted two-to-one against retaining the single-party system imposed by President Kamuzu Banda they put in motion an irreversible political evolution.

Charting Malawi's route to a democratic political dispensation is now the responsibility of both Mr Banda's Malawi Congress Party (MCP) and the many new politicians who have come to light since he was forced by international pressure to take the shutters off Malawian politics.

Although both government and opposition groups have displayed a remarkable commitment to a negotiated resolution of the differences arising from the referendum, the "transition", as it is officially called, remains a difficult process.

Commitment

This is not unexpected, since Banda refused to accept that his government should resign because of its defeat in the referendum, and since the opposition parties are deeply divided.

The Presidential Committee on Dialogue (PCD), which represents the government in the negotiations, has reaffirmed its commitment to seeing through the establishment of a multi-party state.

Minister of State John Tembo said the PCD's apparent tardiness in meeting the opposition groups' Public Affairs Committee (PAC) was due only to its preoccupation with organizing the Republic Day celebrations on July 6, and negotiations would now resume.

He said, however, that the PCD wanted to modify the agreement reached earlier on the establishment of the transitional administration, known as the National Executive Council (NEC), which will supervise the running of the country until a general election is arranged.

A more serious threat to the transition appears to lurk in the dissension among the opposition groups, notably the United Democratic Front (UDF), which has formed itself into a fully-fledged political party, and the Alliance for Democracy (AFORD), which has remained a pressure group.

Not only do the two organisations mistrust the government, they also mistrust each other.

In a recent speech to University of Malawi students, AFORD leader Chakufwa Chihana questioned whether Malawians could trust "some of these people who are now parading, like converts to a new church, as committed democrats, spouting forth about the need for human rights".

In an apparent reference to the several members of the UDF who are former government ministers, Chihana said: "It is the responsibility of society to ensure that those charged with public office are held accountable for their actions, and even their inaction. In this country, however, those who have been responsible for our misery... want to shift all the blame on to one single individual Banda."

The UDF for its part has labelled AFORD as a regionally-based group seeking to promote the interests of people from the north of the country. The UDF says that not only Chihana but most of AFORD's executive are from the north.

This could weigh heavily against AFORD in an election, for the north has a relatively small population composed mainly of the Tumbuka, Tonga and Ngoni tribes, who are heavily outnumbered by the Chewas in the central region and the Yao in the south.

The northerners have a generally higher level of education, which had led to their having a disproportionate influence in the country until Banda's government, in an effort to reverse this trend, took steps to marginalise them.

AFORD and the UDF have produced differing socio-economic policies

The UDF is campaigning on promises to increase basic wages and scrap primary school fees, while AFORD is advocating the redressing of social and economic inequalities.

Insistence

No date has yet been set for the election. It is expected to be held either in December this year or May next year United Nations representatives argue that a December election would not allow enough time for preparation and campaigning in a country that has not known democracy.

AFORD and the government agree with this but the UDF is insisting on a December poll.

If the majority wish prevails, Malawians will go to the polls in about nine months' time. And if the opposition to the MCP splinters further, they could find themselves in the ironic situation of being ruled again by Banda's party, but now by popular consent.
The opposition is deeply divided on how to modify the agreement that needs to be signed by both parties.

The need for a human rights education program is recognized as a key point of contention. The opposition argues for a stronger human rights clause in the agreement, while the government insists on maintaining the status quo.

The tension between the two sides continues to escalate, with each camp accusing the other of bad faith and lack of诚意. The stakes are high, and a resolution to this deadlock is urgently needed.

Yet another Malawi party

BLANTYRE—A former Malawian diplomat announced plans yesterday to launch the country's sixth registered political party following a June referendum rejecting one-party rule.

Mr Tim Mangwaza (59), who has served as Malawi's ambassador to Washington, and the United Nations, said he would officially launch the Malawi National Democratic Party tomorrow.

Aid to Malawi 'possible'

EDWARD WEST

WITH Malawi vowing to become a multiparty democracy, a resumption of international aid and an improvement of trade could be expected, Africalink national development manager Peter West said yesterday.

Africalink is a combined Grindrod, Walon and SDV forwarding and transport arm into Africa.

West said local exporters and road hauliers had faced lengthy delays in receiving forex payments from Malawi over the past 8-12 months. The Road Freight Association said SA truckers were sitting on debt exceeding R5m earlier this year, he said.

An association spokesman said yesterday it had had to negotiate an agreement with the Reserve Bank to obtain a commitment from Malawi to have the debt repaid. Some hauliers were near bankruptcy because of this unpaid debt, he said.

The Foreign Affairs Department and Safico said a positive result from the plebiscite should see the taps partly reopened to foreign aid inflows. West said indications were that aid would be resumed in September.

While these funds would be carefully allocated to approved projects and economic needs, it would go some way towards reviving the country of the recent forex drought, he said.
focus on Nafecce

Soweto 4/8/93

THE National African Federated Chamber of Commerce and Industry’s 29th annual conference highlighted a new sense of realism that is emerging among black business people.

“Time for pious irrelevancies is past, now is the time for action,” says National Sorghum Breweries chief executive Mr Mohale Mahenele.

In the past, gatherings like these used to be preoccupied with finger pointing and very little action—to the extent that some people dismissed Nafecce conferences as “social occasions.”

There was concern that black businessmen were falling into a trap that caught many leaders in post-colonial Africa, where every weakness in governments was blamed on the colonial masters.

Conference rooms overflowed with business thearpy, with most of the time devoted to remedying ills. Even political parties which many expected to break from the monotonous invitational to speak at Nafecce AGMs jumped on to the bandwagon.

This year, though some people still went to gamble while the conference was on, the majority were patient enough to listen to a variety of speakers who gave practical presentations to the audience.

The seriousness that was reflected at Sun City could probably be attributed to the leadership style of Mr Archie Nkonyeni.

In contrast to his predecessor, he does not seem to believe in diplomatic talk and therefore calls a spade a spade.

In his speech, Nkonyeni attacked the Small Business Development Corporation for its ineffectiveness and unwillingness to break the apartheid culture.

He called for a complete overhaul of the ownership and control of the institution.

Nkonyeni described the SBDC as a prisoner caught up in a web of bureaucracy that appeared totally insensitive to the changing economic climate of the country.

The Nafecce president also echoed the major fear of black business people—marginalisation.

At the moment neither the liberation movement nor the Government have come up with a concrete policy to define the role of black business in the post-Apartheid era.

It is only next month the National Economic Forum has promised to release a document proposing the part to be played by small businesses in the future South African economy.

While it is true that most small business enterprises in the country are black, addressing the interests of small business only will not be enough to address the fears of black business.

The essence of Nkonyeni’s speech is that while black business organisations have stopped occasions only to accompany their husbands, made their presence felt.

The passing of a resolution unambiguously explaining women’s rights within Nafecce’s ranks was a major breakthrough in the male-dominated business world.

Black businesswomen had brought Mrs Adelaide Tambo to hammer home the women’s lib message.

Tambo said women comprised the most disempowered group in the country and they also formed the majority of the unemployed.

She was adamant “Our situation cannot correct itself without our active intervention.”

In her passionate call for women to be released from the bondage of economic exploitation, Tambo recalled the old Africa saying “Mangwana o tsowana lhipa ka bohaleng,” meaning that the mother will do all she can to help her family.

Accompanying the speeches, some of which nearly brought the delegates to their feet, were issues relating to unbundling and affirmative action.

The committee charged with the responsibility of investigating means through which black participation could be intensified in the corporate world, was given the additional task of devising strategies that could be explored to maximise black business benefits from the process of unbundling.

Commonly known as the “3426 Committee” in Nafecce circles, the committee was appointed as a follow-up to a call made by former Nafecce president Mr Sam Masukenzane in 1991.

He had, among other things, suggested that 40 percent of the shareholders of companies quoted on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange should be black.

Mr Archie Nkonyeni .. good leadership style.

Reported the liberation movement unashamedly in the past, there were signs that politicians within these movements were aligning themselves with white business and forgetting their long-time backers.

Many black business people are unhappy with the way in which a company, believed to be close to the liberation movement, has set itself on the competition path with black companies, while expectations had been that the company in question would facilitate black entry into the mainstream of the economy.

Nafecce caused an uproar in the corporate world when it refused to oppose economic sanctions against South Africa in the mid-eighties.

The 1993 conference will be remembered by many in Nafecce as the year in which businesswomen, who for a long time went to such

Our situation cannot correct itself without our active intervention.”
Aiding training of blacks

THE Association for the Advancement of Black Accountants of South Africa is an organisation that facilitates and encourages institutions and firms to train black accountants. Therefore, it is important to note that the organisation is not involved in certifying or training accountants. Once a member of the particular professional body is qualified with certification as a CA, CIS, B Com or ACCA, he or she is able to apply for membership of Abasa as long as the person is black.

The ACCA complements the objectives of Abasa that were established. When Abasa was started, representatives went to the UK to seek opportunities for those unable to get into the profession and it was on the basis of this report that the ACCA was invited to participate in South Africa. Black South Africans were unable to train as accountants until 1976.
Which firms make a difference?

Each year we try to find out which company in South Africa has the best social investment and responsibility programmes, reports Reg Rumney.

Which company in South Africa is far ahead of the field in ploughing some of the money it makes back into the benefit of its workers and the community?

The Business & Marketing Intelligence survey of social investment last year found perceptions did not always exactly match reality.

There is a dearth of facts and figures on social investment in South Africa. As David Bonbright, of the Development Resources Centre, points out, measuring such investment is made difficult by the absence of donor disclosure laws, limited tax incentives and a tradition of non-disclosure by government.

When it comes to individual companies, a problem is that social investment and marketing are not the same thing, and that some companies and foundations ostensibly keep a low profile to avoid being inundated with requests for money.

The difference between marketing and true social involvement is a distinction The Weekly Mail & Guardian is careful to make in surveying companies for our yearly Investing in the Future Award.

The purpose of the award is to give recognition to those companies who really have made a difference, and publicise some of the things they have done. In October we will confer the award on the company judged by our panel to excel in social investment.

As part of the process of identifying likely candidates for the award, we ask for nominations from the business community and the public at large of companies who have outstanding social investment programmes.

Accompanying the awards is our special Investing in the Future Review, an in-depth study of some of the issues around corporate social responsibility and investment.

We have added a special award for social investment by smaller companies, which may not have the resources of big corporations, but who nonetheless have shouldered the burden of good corporate citizenship.

A small business could be defined as one with turnover of up to R10-million, gross assets of up to R5-million, and with no more than 100 employees. It would also ideally be owner-managed. However, we realise there has to be some flexibility and that some small businesses may not fit the definitions exactly.

Please fax nominations to Reg Rumney or Tessa Weikley at (011) 403-1025, or phone either of them at (011) 403-7111.
Unionists appointed to NSB board

NATIONAL Sorghum Breweries has appointed trade union officials to its board of directors as a drive to fortify its commitment to black economic empowerment.

And NSB has also set aside R5 million which will be used to fund employees who want to improve their academic qualifications.

This announcement was made at a meeting attended by directors of the NSB and 22 officials of the Food and Allied Workers Union and Food Beverage Workers Union held at Langlaagte in Johannesburg last week.

Mr Mohale Mahanyeke, chief executive officer of NSB, announced that officials of Fawu and the PBWU, who represent workers at the company's 22 plants, had agreed to be appointed to the board of directors.
Managing for survival

By CHERYL IN RETON

IT might jar the senses that corporate leaders are worrying about green issues while the country is bleeding. An executive faced with depressed markets, labour problems and all the trauma associated with South Africa's political transition will probably be tempted to shove matters green and concentrate on survival.

But the Institute of Directors (IOD) suggests that by ignoring the issues executives may be jeopardising their company's future. The IOD has just issued a set of directors' guidelines on corporate environmental management in an attempt to stimulate and guide decision making.

"Management should realise that the resources of the earth are finite and that if conservation is not positively practised, business will undermine the very basis of its existence by destroying its essential resources," says the study.

"Environmental management makes good business sense," adds Jonathan Hobbs, director of the Industrial Environmental Forum. "It is a fallacy that it is a costly business for companies need to use resources more efficiently and effectively to enable them to sustain their business.

Part of the sluggishness of some business leaders in formulating environmental management in South Africa may be the apparent conflict it has with company profits and the reality that long-term benefits are difficult to measure up front.

IOD president Basil Herson says the institute's role is to assist and guide directors. "As population continues to explode, pollution and exploitation problems become increasingly complex. Greater responsibilities are placed on our country's directors as they face decisions affecting both business profitability and survival."

Executive director Richard Wilkinson says the IOD's concern with environmental management should not be seen in isolation. "We participate in the peace accord, affirmative action, deregulation, corporate governance and other issues - like the environment - which are of considerable importance to directors."

The guidelines have been assembled by Margaret Raw, a consultant currently completing a doctor's degree in Business Environmental Management at IOD. Mrs Raw says the need for environmental management comes from several spheres including political, economic, socio-cultural, technical and legal influences.

Political influences include pressure from bodies such as the United Nations, international legislation and treaties concerning conservation, and the growing support of green movements.

Key SA industries that require environmental management & auditing:

- Chemicals
- Effluent treatment
- Electricity & data processing
- Engineering
- Food and drink
- Geology
- Beneficiation
- Coal
- Extraction
- Manufacture
- Mining
- Paper and boards
- Printshop
- Textiles and leather
- Waste disposal

Source: Institute of Directors. Graphic: From Acknowledging the growing education on pollution prevention and waste management are factors.

Economic influences include the growing awareness of the hidden costs of running environmentally risky businesses and the benefits that environmental planning can bring.

"The penalties for ignoring environmental issues are the possibility of barriers to finance and to European markets, liability costs, increases in clean-up costs, insurances and taxes.

The advantages include the potential for economic growth and the competitive edge that becoming a 'green business' may give in the markets."
Finger Points to Soros

London paper slams massive gold sales by US financier's Quantum Fund

George Soros, who has not confirmed profit-taking

Quantum Fund, the financier's hedge fund, made its first reported sale of gold since the early 1980s, according to the Financial Times.

The sale, which occurred last month, came as Soros was building up his position in the gold market, according to the newspaper.

Soros, a well-known investor, has been known to take large positions in gold, and the sale was seen as a sign that he was reducing his exposure to the metal.

The sale of gold by Soros has raised concerns about the state of the gold market, with some analysts suggesting that the sale could lead to further selling pressure.

However, Soros has denied any profit-taking in the sale.

The Financial Times reported that Soros had made the sale last month, but that he had not confirmed it.

The sale was reported to be worth around $2 billion, or about 250 million ounces of gold.

Soros has been a long-time investor in gold, and has been known to take large positions in the metal.

The sale was reported to be part of Soros' larger investment strategy, which includes investments in both stocks and commodities.

The sale came as gold prices were on the rise, due to concerns about the global economy and the potential for more inflation.

However, Soros has denied any profit-taking in the sale, saying that it was part of his overall investment strategy.

The Financial Times reported that Soros had been building up his position in the gold market, and that he was now taking profits.
Malawi agrees on a council

JOHANNESBURG. The government and the opposition in Malawi have agreed on a council to supervise the transition to democracy.

Mr Martin Muthath, who sued the Malawi government for wrongful detention after 27 years in jail, has received his compensation from the government — $1 million US dollars.

Malawian impasse resolved

Blantyre — The deadlock between President Kamuzu Banda's one-party government and the newly formed opposition parties over how Malawi will be administered has been broken.

The impasse arose after the government was decisively defeated in the referendum in June on whether Malawi should remain a one-party state under Dr Banda's Malawi Congress Party (MCP) or become a multiparty democracy.

The MCP agreed to call an election, but a dispute arose over how the country should be ruled in the meantime.

It has now been agreed that a national consultative council (NCC) will be formed, comprising seven Banda and seven opposition representatives.

It will appoint a national executive committee, with two members from each side, which will formulate policy, initiate legislation on the transition to democracy and monitor its implementation.

The committee's proposals will be passed through the Cabinet to parliament, which will either put them into law or refer them back to the committee for further consideration.
Skills workshops for small business

By MAGGIE ROWLEY Deputy Business Editor

A SERIES of workshops aimed at developing business skills for small, established entrepreneurs and managers is being launched in the Western Cape.

The workshops are to be run by Business Skills for Southern Africa (BSSA), a non-profitmaking foundation formed by Coopers & Lybrand in partnership with the National Industrial Chamber.

BSSA acquired the rights to a tried and tested British programme which has been run successfully in Britain since the early 1980s and has adapted it to suit South African conditions.

The six core modules cover practical marketing, personal selling skills, customer care, debt recovery and cash control, increasing profit through correct price and effective management.

To date about 600 entrepreneurs and managers have been trained on 20 similar courses in Natal and the Transvaal by BSSA which is now launching the first course in the Western Cape region.

Coopers Lybrand partner Mario Roosanga said the courses were designed for people with up and going businesses who had felt "the pain of being turned down for loan finance or experienced bad debt, problems of cash flows, difficulting in marketing products and so forth."
Malawi strikers seal off street

Blantyre — About 2,000 of the more than 10,000 striking Malawian civil servants blocked one of Blantyre's main streets yesterday until armed policemen moved in to clear the road.

The civil servants, who make up the single largest group of workers in this tiny and poor southern African country, are demanding a 150 percent across-the-board salary increase.

In a last-minute attempt to avert the strike, the Malawian government offered a 10-15 percent pay increase on Monday and appealed to the workers not to go ahead with the stoppage.

Elections for Malawi in May

Blantyre—Malawi's first multiparty elections are to be held on May 16 next year.

The date was agreed upon between members of the National Consultative Council, made up of both government and opposition politicians, the President's Committee on Dialogue which represents President Banda, and the Public Affairs Committee, an umbrella body for the opposition parties.

The meeting reportedly also agreed that parliament meet next month in Zomba so that the law providing for life presidency for Banda can be scrapped.—Star Abnea Service.
Malawians revel in new openness but Banda clings on

Malawi's octogenarian President for Life looks increasingly as though he may keep that title as the opposition dithers, The Argus Africa News Service reports from Blantyre

Malawi's governance has become remarkably transparent since the voters rejected President Kamuzu Banda's single-party government in the referendum in June.

For the first time journalists are reporting on issues that in the past were considered untouchable. Even cartoons of the president and his ministers are frequently published — something that one could have landed editors in jail.

One of several independent daily newspapers that have mushroomed in the new climate of relative tolerance published a cartoon showing Dr Banda being pushed in a wheelbarrow by his right-hand man, Minister of State John Tembo. The suggestion obviously was that Dr Banda is no longer able to run the country and Mr Tembo is in fact in charge.

Recently a rumour circulated that Dr Banda had died. This subject was once taboo that no journalist would have dared to touch it but this time a reporter was bold enough to telephone the presidential palace to check the rumour. The palace denied it by way of a rude remark and the story was published — and the newspaper was bought out by Malawians relishing the new freedom of information.

There are at present more than 20 independent newspapers, all of which are often critical of the government and of Dr Banda in particular.

The judicial system, which had lost credibility because of interventions by Dr Banda and some of his cabinet colleagues, has also had some of its stature restored, notably when Macpherson Mutharika, who is often referred to as the Nelson Mandela of Malawi because of the time he spent in jail as a political prisoner — was awarded about US$3.7 million for illegal detention.

Aleke Banda, another opposition politician, sued the Malawi Congress Party for defamation and was awarded about US$25,000. The children of three cabinet ministers who died mysteriously in 1983 also plan to sue Dr Banda for damages.

In spite of the new sense of freedom after years of dictatorship, the transition to a new political dispensation that many Malawians expected as a result of the referendum has not materialized. While accepting the voters' preference for a multiparty system, Dr Banda is insisting on his government serving out its term before a new one is democratically elected, and the divided opposition seems unable to force the pace of change.

The National Consultative Council (NCC), created as a policy-forming body representing all political parties, met for the first time in Lilongwe recently, but the council did little apart from drawing up an agenda.

The opposition parties, working under the umbrella of the Public Affairs Committee (PAC), are widely considered to have made too many compromises to retain the initiative that came their way through the referendum.

Recently, Dr Banda's Presidential Committee on Reconciliation proposed that the NCC should not be empowered to change any law without the approval of parliament, contrary to initial agreement on the structure and functions of the council.

The government's success in neutralising the opposition is attributed to the political skill of the Minister of Health, Dr Hetherwick Ntaba, whose star seems to be shining brightly in the MCP. Dr Ntaba is also tipped as a possible successor to Dr Banda — a post previously considered to be reserved for John Tembo.

But even Mr Tembo is speaking reconciliation these days, in sharp contrast to his reputation as the MCP's hatchet man. At public meetings he has urged respect for the rights of opposition parties.

While it is still holding on to power, the MCP has been hit by a string of resignations. First, Justice Minister Friday Makula quit, accusing the president of interfering in the administration of justice, and joined the opposition United Democratic Front. Then Fides Ndasauka, MCP chief for the Mulanje area, also resigned to join the UDF. He was followed by Trade and Industry Minister Dalton Katopola.

The UDF made another significant gain when the Chief of the Preferential Trade Area (PTA), Dr Bingu wa Mutharika, announced that he had joined the party.

In spite of these successes, the opposition groups appear to have been disarmed by the government's new openness. The question now is whether they will be able to hold together long enough to see the ageing Dr Banda out of office, or whether the man who bestowed on himself the title of President for Life will be able to retain it by winning the election.
Malawi opposition gets bigger say

MALAWI’s opposition parties have welcomed the recent signing of a new agreement which gives them a bigger say in government in the run-up to the country’s first multi-party elections.

Speaking from his Blantyre office, United Democratic Front chairperson Mr Bakili Muluzi said: “We have made some inroads and a breakthrough in our quest for democratic tenets in Malawi. People’s views are now respected and that is what you call democracy.”

The leader of the Alliance for Democracy, Mr Chakufwa Chihana, said: “This is what we have been fighting for. We have at last made a worthwhile headway but there are a lot of repressive laws to be erased from the statutes.”

Dr Harry Bwanazoti, who heads the United Front for Multi-party Democracy, said the road to the elections was beginning to be smooth.

“Malawi has a bright and better constitutional prospects for participation by all Malawians through their respective political parties,” he said.

A national executive council will make recommendations to the cabinet in terms of administrative matters during the transition period.

Similarly, a national consultative council will oversee the drafting of the new Malawian constitution, the delimitation of constituencies and the drafting of new electoral regulations.

The consultative council will also be responsible for the electoral commission governing elections and the removal of all repressive and oppressive laws from the statutes during the transition to elections scheduled for mid-1994.

A spokesperson for the ruling Malawi Congress Party, Dr Hetherwick Ntaba, said: “The working group of representatives from the various parties had dropped demands that the two councils should have overriding powers over the cabinet.

“But their decisions and recommendations will be given serious hearing and attention by the Malawi government,” said Ntaba.

According to the agreement, both councils would have an implicit veto on any legislation the government might wish to pass, if found to be incompatible with national aspirations.

The working group also agreed that every registered political party in Malawi would contribute seven members to the public affairs committee, which in turn would propose two members to both the national executive council and the national consultative council.

“The Malawi government and the opposition have at last reached a compromise and a working rapport and the constitutional set up should smoothen things during the transitional period,” said a senior government official in Lilongwe — AIA.
MALAWI President Hastings Kamuzu Banda was feeling better and looking forward to returning home after brain surgery in Johannesburg, hospital authorities said yesterday.

Garden City Clinic manager Andre Nel said Banda continued to make good progress after surgeons removed excess fluid from his brain on Sunday.

"The cause is unknown but it has been confirmed that he does not have a brain tumour. There are also no signs of a stroke. The prognosis remains good."

Nel said earlier Banda could be discharged from the clinic within a week or two if his condition continued to improve.

Banda was flown to SA on Saturday, accompanied by an SA doctor and nurses, to "specialised facilities for diagnosis and treatment".
Banda's illness unsettles Malawi

As ageing President Hastings Banda is taken ill, Malawians are asking what kind of party keeps a man in jail for 13 years and then makes him its general secretary? Nick Young in Lilongwe

Uncertainty surrounding the health of Malawi's President Dr Hastings Kamuzu Banda, down to Johannesberg for emergency medical treatment last weekend, has jolted the ruling party into making an unprecedented appointment and highlighted complications in what had so far seemed a smooth transition to multiparty government.

Gwanda Chakuamba, a former government minister who was jailed for sedition in 1980 and not released until July this year — whereupon he joined the opposition United Democratic Front — has been made secretary general of President Banda's Malawian Congress Party.

The post had been vacant for 10 years. Its last occupant, Dick Matejje, died in a 1985 road accident — described by the pro-democracy movement as an extra-judicial execution — after disagreements with the president.

The title of secretary general was a gift to be given by the president. Apparently fearing rejection, he had refrained from bestowing it, even upon the otherwise favoured John Tembo, Minister of State in the Cabinet Office, uncle of Dr Banda's official consort and long considered his heir apparent.

Political commentators from all camps received the news of Chakuamba's elevation with astonishment when it was made public on Wednesday. It is not yet known whether Banda (86) approved the appointment from his sickbed, or whether it is the initiative of senior party colleagues in an attempt to resolve a constitutional crisis.

Only hours before the announcement was made, a government minister had commented "it is not up to people like us to choose someone."

Although no official comment has been made on the nature of Banda's illness, statements from Garden City Clinic about his treatment and progress, so far described as "good", are consistent with speculation that he suffered a subdural brain haemorrhage. The condition is not uncommon in elderly people and, if treated, is not in itself life-threatening. Government secrecy, however, fuelled rather than damped midweek speculation.

According to the constitution, if Banda either died or was unable to perform the functions of office, power should pass to a presidential council led by the secretary general of the Congress Party. Hence the pressure for the party, conducting its annual convention this week, to select a successor, to fill the post.

Yet it is not clear that present constitutional arrangements remain valid. Since the June 1993 referendum, in which a decisive majority of Malawians voted in favour of political pluralism, the government has until now honoured its pledge to involve the opposition in negotiations on the country's future.

A National Consultative Council was set up in August, charged with drawing up an electoral law and timetable. Government representatives on the council are outnumbered by representatives from the now legalised opposition parties.

Negotiations were proceeding smoothly, and a target date set for elections next May, in the expectation that agreements would be rubber-stamped by the existing parliament. But it is now an open question as to whether the council would have a role in the selection of a caretaker president, if this proved necessary.

Baskil Muluzi, leader of the United Democratic Front, has called for "all opposition parties to be involved in finding an interim solution" if Banda does not make a full and rapid recovery. The Alliance for Democracy would probably favour the appointment of a non-political caretaker president, preferably a high court judge, pending elections. Spokesman Mordecai Mathia said the Alliance "would not consider any form of power sharing without a clear mandate from the Malawian people."

A further dispute has arisen between the council and the government over the Malawi Young Pioneers. The council had called for the disbanding of the paramilitary wing of the Pioneers, in effect a 2,000-strong private army of the Congress Party, immune from prosecution.

The government, although apparently committed to eventually disarming the Pioneers, argues that it is not in the council's brief to make this kind of decision.

All this leaves Malawians wondering where authority now lies in the country.

Rumours about Banda's illness, many of them remarkably accurate, were rife among the opposition parties long before the Malawi Broadcasting Corporation announced that Banda had left the country for a "routine check-up."

Later informed by the state radio that Banda had undergone neural surgery, Malawians responded with a mixture of concern and caution. Despite his long dictatorship, there is little Malawi press blossoms, but will the flowers fade?

Farouk Chothia recently held a training session for journalists in Malawi. He witnessed a ‘Blantyre spring’, in which a new crop of independent newspapers — and some owned by opposition parties — have set out to rewrite Malawi’s history.

AY after day Aloysius Kadade (not his real name) wrote the same stories President Of Malawi Dr Kamuzu Banda visits cornfields in the central region, Banda’s ‘Official Hostess’, Cecilia Kadzimira, opens a new hospital, Minister of State John Tembo addresses a rally. A journalist for 30 years in Malawi’s state-controlled media, Kadade got his only break in the 1980s Mozambican refugees fled into Malawi to escape the civil war in their country. It was a watershed moment — for the first time he felt he was a journalist.

“The was the one time when I got the freedom to write what I wanted to, to go and find out for myself what was happening.”

Now 53, Kadade, a gentle, grey-humoured, thoughtful man with an impeccable grasp of English, has been given a second chance. He has joined one of the 20 or more independent papers which have sprung up in Malawi in the past 18 months. Banda’s 30-year regime stunted journalism in Malawi to a much greater extent than South Africa’s finger-wagging PW Botha. With the only newspapers, The Daily Times and Mzansi News, owned by the government, journalists were forced to follow the writ of politicians. A law decreed life imprisonment for journalists who printed “false and defamatory statements” about politicians. It was a period when Banda’s picture had to appear on the front page each day, when journalists’ stories were vetted before publication. It was mandatory to use the leader’s full title “His Excellency the Life President General Dr H Kamuzu Banda” and to refer to his right-hand man as “Minister of State the Honourable John Tembo”.

Journalists lived in terror of the politicians. “A colleague once received a speech delivered by the Official Hostess,” Kadade said. “It was a statement that he was incapacitated. He ended up in jail.”

The media was a microcosm of Malawian society an eight million-strong nation which was not even allowed to speculate on how old his leader was. Thought to be in his 90s, Banda’s age is an official secret. In those times, Malawians were not allowed to hang pictures higher than Banda’s portrait.

In his 40-year reign, Banda — and in recent years, Kadzimira and Tembo — has tolerated no opposition. Close colleagues who questioned his authoritarian rule were jailed. At least 10,000 people disappeared, many of them. It is rumoured, into the crocodile-infested Shire River.

The editor of The Monitor, Daricus Chirwa, recalled “You couldn’t be critical of Banda, or you’d be picked up.” Although he had been keen in politics, Chirwa steered clear of the subject as a journalist, instead reporting on sport for the government-owned press.

His career stagnated because of the imprisonment of his sister and brother-in-law for political offences. Banda’s grip on power loosened last year after tens of thousands of Malawians cast their votes against him to take part in mass demonstrations. The government was deposed against the one-party system. Building under the pressure, the president-for-life called a referendum in June this year, in which 83 per cent of Malawians voted in favour of multi-partyism.

Journalists are now crying out for the journalist’s skills they have never needed in the classroom. They described thousands of publications under which they work. Most of the newspapers have only one telephone, one car and one room which serves as an office. A pen costs about 250 kwacha, a notebook 2000 kwacha, and wages are low.

They also spoke passionately of their dilemma how to produce good newspapers while fighting for change. Under commercial pressure, many publications are expected to disappear. After this year’s multi-party elections, but the journalists want, at least, to see Banda, Kadzimira and Tembo off the political stage.

Their method is to rewrite Malawi’s official history by unearthing the Banda government’s unpublished atrocities. The Monitor carries a weekly column entitled “Know Your History” which focuses on Banda’s misdeeds.

At the same time, they are terri- fied by what they are doing. In their columns and cartoons, they decide the government, and some of their reportage is highly defamatory. But in conversation they still cannot refer to Banda and Kadzi- mira by their surnames, calling him respectively “the president” and “the man.”

The Nation, owned by opposition politician Aleke Banda,: epitomises the new breed of newspapers. The most powerful newspaper illustrated with crude but effective graphics, it recently showed light on the death of four senior politicians — Dick Matenje, Aaron Gadama, Twabun Sungali and Samuel Chilungu — in 1983.

The Nation ferreted out an eyewitness, a retired police officer, who broke his 10-year silence to reveal that the four had been shot in cold blood. In its report days after the event, the government’s official spokesman issued an official statement saying the four had died in a car accident.

This edition of The Nation sold out within hours. Demand was so high that it was reprinted and back on the streets five days later.

The government has not for Democracy, but still taken court action. Its only response has been to close the national archives — an important resource for The Monitor’s history column — for “administrative reasons.”

A vital restraining influence has been the freeze on aid by the international community until elections are held.

But this period of unbridled free speech freedom may be a brief summer. The exposé, because they are new in Malawi and allow the expression of long pent-up anger, have hugely boosted newspaper sales. Just as Febbraio’s 1980 posed a crisis for South Africa’s “alternative” press, a new order in Malawi may cut off supplies of paper from beneath the fledgling independen-

Ownership poses the other problem. Most of the papers were launched by members of opposition parties, notably the Alliance Democratic Front. But if they come to power, will they respect the autonomy of newspapers they control?
Concern about Malawian govt

MALAWIAN opposition parties have asked for a meeting with the government to discuss who should run the country while President Kamuzu Banda recovers from surgery in Johannesburg.

"We have asked the government for a meeting within this week," Bakili Muluzi, chairman of the opposition United Democratic Front (UDF), said by telephone from Blantyre yesterday.

"We are very concerned about Banda's sickness at this hour of transition (to democracy)."

The ruling Malawi Congress Party's (MCP) constitution says if the president dies or is unable to govern, the secretary-general and two senior cabinet ministers should form a commission to run the country until general elections in 45 days.

"This should not happen," Muluzi said "We (the opposition) want to be involved in that sort of decision-making."

The MCP on Tuesday named Gwanda Chakuamba, one of a number of government figures who were jailed or vanished after falling out of the president, as the new secretary-general.

Malawi opens up to investment

BLANTYRE - Malawi has finally opened its doors to foreign investment.

With assistance worth $1m from the World Bank, the government has established the Malawi Investment Promotion Agency to attract local and foreign investors.

Agency head Malcolm Banda said the few investors Malawi had attracted thus far had concentrated on tobacco, ignoring mining, manufacturing and the service sectors.

Banda pointed to Malawi's good roads and telecommunications and said his agency had streamlined administrative hurdles that had frustrated potential investors in the past.

Foreign firms can now become incorporated in Malawi in 15 days, rather than two years as before. In addition, companies can import capital equipment duty free and are exempt from value-added taxes.

But opposition politicians and former Malawi Chamber of Commerce and Industry chairman Harry Thomson warned that foreign investors were looking for tariffs that made imported goods cheaper and easier to sell than domestically produced products.

He urged the government to take steps to help local industries withstand "ruthless and unfair competition (from) foreign imports, which in many cases are of inferior quality."

But he agreed that the launch of the investment agency was "a challenge to the private sector" in Malawi. - Sapa-AFP.
Banda makes progress despite convulsion

BY SHIRLEY WOODGATE

Malawian President Kamuzu Banda has suffered a mild convulsion in a Johannesburg hospital where he underwent neuro-surgery last week, said Garden City Clinic manager Dr Andre Nel.

Doctors had earlier confirmed that excess fluid was removed from Banda’s brain during the operation, but that he did not have a brain tumour.

Nel added that despite the setback, which had not recurred, the ageing African ruler was making “acceptable” progress, although he was suffering from depression.

“This may be a consequence of the operation and his stay in the intensive care unit”

He is due to be transferred to a normal ward today.

If he continues to make good progress, he may be discharged from hospital within a week to 10 days, Nel said.

Banda, believed to be in his 90s, was flown to Johannesburg from Malawi last Saturday, accompanied by a South African doctor and nurses, and underwent surgery the next day.
Malawi to close courts

BLANTYRE — Malawi's traditional courts, used extensively to try political opponents of President Hastings Banda, have been suspended, a local newspaper reported yesterday.

The Malawi Democrat quoted Justice Minister Lovemore Mwilu as saying the suspension would remain until parliament repealed the law under which they were established.

Widely criticised by international human rights organisations as "kangaroo courts", the traditional courts denied defendants legal representation and were presided over by government-appointed chiefs with no legal qualifications.

The courts had the power to impose the death penalty — Sapa-APF.
Malawi's interim leader was once sent to jail by Banda

Blantyre — In any fresh twist of fate, President Kamuzu Banda's role as head of state in Malawi has been taken over, at least for the time being, by a man he had once jailed for 22 years for sedition.

Gwanda Chakuamba could even end up as president of Malawi if Banda — in a Johannesburg hospital after undergoing brain surgery — does not recover within the next two weeks.

In terms of the constitution, Chakuamba, as secretary-general of the ruling Malawi Congress Party, has become chairman of the Presidential Council which has been set up to take over the president's functions because of Banda's illness.

He resigned only a few days ago from the opposition United Democratic Front to rejoin Banda's MCP as secretary-general.

Success

The other members of the three-man Presidential Council are Minister of State John Tembo, who has long been regarded as Banda's right-hand man and likely successor, and Robson Chirwa, the MCP’s northern region chairman.

The Presidential Council can function for only two weeks before a new head of state is chosen.

Unless Banda recovers sufficiently to resume his duties, Chakuamba, as chairman of the Presidential Council, is ostensibly the one most likely to be appointed to succeed him as president.

Many Malawians are wondering, however, whether the real power does not remain with Tembo and his niece Cecilia Kadzamira, Banda's Official Hostess, who accompanied the ailing president to Johannesburg and has remained close to him ever since.

Chakuamba once headed the Malawi Young Pioneers, the youth movement which forcefully maintained respect for the MCP during the unchallenged years of Banda's rule.

He later lost favour with Banda.
Malawi sets date for first poll as Banda loses grip

BLANTYRE — Malawi's first multiparty presidential and general elections will be held on May 17.

The Daily Times reported this yesterday as a new presidential council was due to be sworn in. Kallyonia Phumisa, the chairman of the National Consultative Council (NCC) a grouping of all six of the country's political parties, told the semi-official daily that the council had agreed on the date at a meeting this week.

Mr Phumisa said results of the presidential and parliamentary elections would be announced on May 19 and the president sworn in on May 21.

Meanwhile, a newly-appointed presidential council was due to be inaugurated amid a constitutional crisis caused by the absence of the elderly President Kamuzu Banda, who underwent brain surgery in South Africa on October 3.

The constitution, which will be largely rewritten to allow for multiparty politics when parliament meets this month, deliberately avoided the taboo issue of succession to Mr Banda, believed to be in his nineties.

ELANTHIRE. — A man who spent 13 years in jail for anti-government activities was sworn in yesterday as head of a council to run Malawi while President Kamuzu Banda recovers from brain surgery in South Africa.

Dwanda Chakuamba (38) pledged to serve Malawians while Banda is recuperating. Chakuamba was jailed for anti-government activities and plotting to assassinate Banda.
Banda holds talks

Malawian President Dr Kamuzu Banda held a one-hour discussion yesterday with the newly formed Malawi Presidential Council, Garden City Clinic manager Dr A Nel said in a statement.

The meeting discussed proceedings at the Malawi Congress Party's annual congress and the upcoming elections.

Banda was recovering well, the statement said, adding that the ailing president was receiving physiotherapy and walking short distances.

Banda's Malawi Congress Party has rejected opposition demands that an interim president be appointed until elections scheduled for May.

Party spokesman Hetherwick Ntaba told the semi-official Malawi News at the weekend that a three-man Presidential Council appointed last week would run the country until Banda recovers or the elections are held — Sapa.
Malawi groups want interim president

Blantyre — Malawi's President Kamuzu Banda is recovering well after a brain operation in SA, his doctor said yesterday.

"I saw him this morning. We had a long chat. He is in high spirits after spending a comfortable night and he is pleased to be home," said Dr Hethewwek Ntchaka, who is also foreign minister.

Banda, believed to be in his 90s, returned to Malawi on Sunday.

A three-man presidential council has been running the country during his illness.

Opposition groups in the country have demanded that the council convene parliament by tomorrow to elect an interim president.

Malawi's 'boss'
but for how long?

Gwanda Chakuamba, the man appointed as stand-in for President Ka\u2006mu ka\u2006 banda during his illness, appears to have taken firm control of the Malawi government.

Chakuamba has told people in his home district of Bangula that he is now running the country whether the opposition parties like it or not.

After the defeat of Banda's Malawi Congress Party ( MCP) in the referendum last June on multiparty democracy, the government agreed in effect to share power with the opposition until an election next May. This was to have been done through a National Consultative Council on which both government and opposition are represented.

The situation changed somewhat, however, when Banda was flown to Johannes\u2006 burg for brain surgery last month.

A three-man Presidential Council was set up to carry out its functions, as required by the MCP constitution which, in a carry-over from the one-party state, is also Malawi's constitution.

Chakuamba became chairman of the council by virtue of his position as MCP secretary-general, to which he had only recently been appointed by Banda.

It was an appointment that surprised most Malawians since Chakuamba had not long been out of the jail to which he had been sent for a 22-year sentence ordered by Banda after falling out with him. What made it more surprising was that while in jail Chakuamba had abandoned the MCP to join the opposition United Democratic Front (UDF).

His quiet return to the MCP was seen by many Malawians as a move of political expediency unlikely to raise his public popularity, which had, in any case, suffered from his leadership, before going to jail, of the Malawi Young Pioneers, the youth organization that ruthlessly enforced MCP dictates.

He has taken to behaving more like a fully-fledged president than a locum, travelling in a motorcade with police sirens blaring and being accompanied everywhere by security agents.

One Malawian journalist dubbed him the "prisoner-turned-president".

Dismissing criticism of his flip-flop allegiance, Chakuamba said: "It is my right to choose any party that I like I am running the country."

Recently, Chakuamba boasted: "No other person but the president can receive credentials from an ambassador of another country yet I was recently doing just that in Zomba (site of State House)."

In a cabinet reshuffle this week Chakuamba was made Minister of Home Affairs. Since this portfolio controls the security police it is one of considerable power, and Chakuamba's ability to acquire it suggests he has become more than Banda's understudy.

Speculation

His apparent rise to power has surprised many Malawians, who had believed that the real power behind Banda's throne was held by Minister of State John Tembo and his niece, Cecilia Kadzamira, Banda's official hostess.

When Chakuamba was made MCP secretary-general there was speculation that he was frontal for Tembo.

But since becoming chairman of the Presidential Council Chakuamba has acted more like his own man than as a Tembo surrogate, leading some Malawians to speculate that Tembo, even though he is a member of the council, may have lost control of his Frankenstein creation.

Ironically, Chakuamba may not be any more popular than Tembo and no more likely to lead the MCP back to power.

When he came out of jail as a UDF champion people in the Lower Shire Valley chanted at a UDF rally: "Wherever Gwanda Chakuamba goes we will follow." But recently the local chief Nyachikidza put a new twist on it by saying: "We are not wagons that have to follow Gwanda wherever he decides to go."

Chakuamba's own Chief Molo has said he feels betrayed and agrees with the view expressed by some Malawians that Chakuamba is a "sell-out".

Chakuamba's seemingly unchallenged assumption of the leadership of the MCP suggests that he will be at the party's helm during the election if the aged Banda does not recover sufficiently to take over again.

His chances of leading the MCP to victory in the election will be lessened, however, if the opposition parties carry through their current moves to cease their bickering and unite to oust the government.

After uniting successfully against the MCP in the democracy referendum, the UDF and the Alliance For Democracy (Aford) opted to fight the election separately. This dismayed Malawians who saw it as a "Kenya syndrome" with the party that had imposed one-party rule being returned to power in a democratic election because of division among the opposition.

Responding to the growing public demand for opposition unity, the UDF sent signals that it was willing to talk about it. Aford leader Chakufwa Chibana initially spurned these overtures, saying the UDF had too many corruption-tainted deserters from Banda's dictatorship in its ranks for his liking.

Recently, Aford has indicated that it is willing to talk about some form of united front in the election.

Chibana may change his mind about unity if it becomes clear that Banda's illness will remove him permanently from the MCP's leadership, for without Banda's craftsmanship and mystique the MCP would represent far less of a threat.

But Chibana will probably be much more amenable to unity if he thinks that Tembo still holds the MCP's reins and that Chakuamba, while he may be wearing Banda's hat, is wearing Tembo's bridle.

PALACE COUP  Step to fill the gap caused by Banda’s illness may backfire:

“It is my right to choose any party that I like”

BLANTYRE — Mr Gwanda Chakwamba, the man appointed as stand-in for President Kamuzu Banda during his illness, appears to have taken firm control of the Malawi government. Chakwamba has told people in his home district of Bangula that he is now running the country, whether the opposition parties like it or not.

After the defeat of Banda’s Malawi Congress Party (MCP) in the referendum last June on multiparty democracy, the government agreed in effect to share power with the opposition until an election is held in May. This was to have been done through a National Consultative Council on which the government and opposition are represented.

The situation changed somewhat, however, when Banda was flown to Johannesburg for brain surgery last month. A three-man Presidential Council was set up to carry out its functions, as required by the MCP constitution which, in a carry-over from the one-party state, is also Malawi’s constitution.

Banda appointee

Chakwamba became chairman of the council by virtue of his position as MCP secretary-general, to which he had only recently been appointed by Banda.

It was an appointment that surprised most Malawians, since Chakwamba had not long been out of jail to which he had been sent for 22 years. He was then ordered by Banda after falling out with him. What made it more surprising was that while in jail Chakwamba had abandoned the MCP to join the opposition United Democratic Front.

His quick return to the MCP was seen by many Malawians as a move of political expediency unlikely to raise his public popularity, which had in any case suffered from his leadership, before going to jail, of the Malawi Young Pioneers, the youth organization that ruthlessly enforced MCP dictates.

But none of this seems to have bothered Chakwamba since his sudden elevation to power. He has taken to behaving more like a fully-fledged president than a locum, travelling in a motorcade with police sirens blaring and being accompanied everywhere by security agents.

One Malawian journalist dubbed him the “prisoner-turned-president.”

Dismissing criticism of his flip-flop allegiance, Chakwamba said: “It is my right to choose any party that I like. I am running the country.”

He denied suggestions by opposition politicians that he had been bribed by the MCP to defect from the UDF.

Recently Chakwamba boasted: “No other person but the president can receive credentials from an ambassador of another country yet I was recently doing just that in Zomba (site of State House).”

In a cabinet reshuffle this week Chakwamba was made Minister of Home Affairs. Since this portfolio controls the security police it is one of considerable power and Chakwamba’s ability to acquire it suggests he has become more than Banda’s understudy.

His apparent ease to power has surprised many Malawians who had believed that the real power behind Banda’s throne was held by Minister of State Mr John Tembo and his niece, Miss Cecilia Kadzamira, Banda’s official hostess. When Chakwamba was made MCP secretary-general there was speculation that he was fronting for Tembo, whose reputation for ruthlessness in imposing Banda’s dictates had made him widely unpopular.

But since becoming chairman of the Presidential Council Chakwamba has acted more like his own man than as a Tembo surrogate, leading some Malawians to speculate that Tembo, even though he is a member of the council, may have lost control of his Frankenstein creation.

Ironically, Chakwamba may not be any more popular than Tembo and no more likely to lead the MCP back to power in the election.

When he came out of jail as a UDF champion people in the Lower Shire Valley chanted at a UDF rally: “Whenever Gwanda Chakwamba goes we will follow.”

But recently the local Chief Nyachokazza put a new twist on it by saying: “We are not wagons that have to follow Gwanda wherever he decides to go.”

Chakwamba’s own Chief Miholo has said he feels betrayed and agrees with the view expressed by some Malawians that Chakwamba is a “sell-out.”

Opposition bickering

Chakwamba’s seemingly unchallenged assumption of the leadership of the MCP suggests that he will be at the party’s helm during the election. If the aged Banda does not recover sufficiently to take over again, his chances of leading the MCP to victory in the election will be lessened, however, if the opposition parties carry their current moves to cease its bickering and unite to oust the government.

After uniting successfully against the MCP in the democracy referendum, the UDF and the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) opted to fight the election separately.

This dismayed Malawians who saw it as a “Kenya syndrome”, with the party that had imposed one-party rule being returned to power in a democratic election because of division among the opposition.

Responding to the growing public demand for opposition unity, the UDF sent signals that it was willing to talk about it.

Aford leader Mr Chakufwa Chihana initially spurned these overtures, saying the UDF had too many corruption-tainted deserters from Banda’s dictatorship in its ranks for his liking.

Recently Aford has indicated that it is willing to talk about some form of united front in the election.

Chihana may change his mind about unity if it becomes clear that Banda’s illness will remove him permanently from the MCP’s leadership, for without Banda’s craftiness and mystique the MCP would represent far less of a threat.

But Chihana will probably be much more amenable to unity if he thinks that Tembo still holds the MCP’s reins and that Chakwamba, while he may be wearing Banda’s hat, is also wearing Tembo’s brigade.
Unpopular laws to go in Malawi

Women will wear pants and men long hair.

B

LANTYRE — The law under which President Kamuzu Banda's Malawi Congress Party government was able to jail people without trial will be scrapped when parliament meets on November 16.

Also to be repealed is the law forbidding long trousers on women and long hair on men which the country's idiosyncratic president imposed rigorously during his years of autocratic power.

The scrapping of these and other unpopular laws has been agreed to by the National Consultative Council, the multiparty body formed ostensibly to run the country after the voters overwhelmingly rejected the MCP's one-party rule in a June referendum.

While the five opposition parties are supposed to be running the country jointly with the MCP government through the NCC, the real power appears to remain with the president, and particularly with the three-man Presidential Council set up to carry out the functions of the president after Dr Banda was flown to South Africa for brain surgery last month.

The council, headed by MCP secretary-general Mr Gwanda Chakamba, has rejected the opposition parties' demand for the appointment of an interim president rather than a Presidential Council.

"It is unconstitutional to elect an interim president. The President's Council is there to rule now," MCP publicity secretary Mr Hetherwick Ntaba said.

Ntaba also rejected opposition allegations that Banda had been removed as president, although he conceded that most of the many cabinet portfolios formerly held by Banda have been taken over by others. Only the defence portfolio was still held by Banda, he said, but indicated that this too might be taken over.
Malawi’s press relishes new freedoms

Nick Young in Lilongwe

DAVID NTHENGWE was a top English student at Mzimba secondary school in northern Malawi. He wanted to make his living by writing, but opportunities were minimal in a country where the government monopolised the small, rigidly censored print media. So for years David worked as a customs officer instead.

Now he is realising his ambition as a staff writer on The Independent, one of no fewer than 21 newspapers circulating freely as Malawi finally emerges from one-party rule.

The regime of Life President Hastings Banda, in power since 1964, brought a measure of stability to Malawi, but the cost was ruthless suppression of dissent. Last year Banda finally called a referendum on the country’s constitutional future, and Malawians voted for multi-party government.

The proliferation of uncensored newspapers is the most visible sign of change so far. New titles began to appear when the referendum was announced, and now they speak with growing confidence and authority. Most are four to eight-page tabloids, operating on a shoestring. Few show a profit. Their viability is dependent on desk-top publishing and the enthusiasm of their untrained staff.

Some of the reporting is speculative or inaccurate, and much editorialising is pompous and given to unnecessary displays of learning. Yet, given the lack of a tradition of press freedom, it is remarkable how responsible and restrained most papers are.

Sales are buoyant. The public relishes access to uncensored information and comment. Questions of house style themselves have symbolic weight. The government Daily Times, for instance, still accords Banda has full honourific titles at each mention: “His Excellency, the Life President, Ngwira (Lion) Dr Hastings Banda.” But Malawians now delight in seeing him referred to only as “Dr Banda” or “the president”.

What is new, too, is the issue of title. The Independent is currently being sued for defamation by Aicke Banda (no relation), proprietor of a rival paper, The Nation, over an article linking him to atrocities committed by the Malawi Young Pioneers, a government quasi-military youth group.

Then there is editorial independence. The Nation and The Malawi Democrat are linked to the two main opposition groups, the United Democratic Front and the Alliance for Democracy respectively. Both editors claim editorial freedom to criticise the parties that spawned them, but when profitability is at best slender there is the danger of a paper playing the tune it is paid to play.

Mike Kamwendo, publisher of the conservative The New Nation, believes his rivals identify themselves too readily as “opposition” outlets. Thus, he argues, will make it harder for them to maintain a readership when the political process moves on, particularly if the economic expectations raised by a democratic government are disappointed.

The Malawian press bubble may be about to burst. Editors agree that, out of the nine million population, not more than 60,000 Malawians are affluent and literate enough to buy a newspaper regularly. The small market and low potential for advertising mean that competition between papers is fierce. The temptation is to lead with sensational, and sometimes misleading, stories.

Yet the role of the newspapers will remain important for some time. With Banda convalescing from brain surgery and executive power in the hands of a triumvirate from Banda’s Malawi Congress Party, there are fears that some may try to delay the May 1994 election target date.

A vociferous press, even if it is addressing only a minority, will be valuable in keeping the democratisation process on track. And a free press could press a new government to behave in a more transparent and accountable way. Much depends on the efforts of people like David Nthengwe — Gernut News Service
ZOMBA (Malawi) — Deputies met here to repeal sections of the Constitution incompatible with multiparty politics ahead of Malawi’s first multiparty general election next year.

Laws due to be repealed or amended during the week-long session cover sectors like the Public Security Act, the Forfeiture Act and the Decency in Dress Act.

Justice Minister Lovemore Mnulo, discussing the Public Security Bill, said that for security purposes the bill would not be scrapped entirely. However, the most unpopular section, on detention without trial, would be repealed.

The act was passed after a cabinet crisis in 1964 to enable President Kamuzu Banda to deal with the opposition.

The Forfeiture Act, which empowered Mr Banda to take property from businessmen who fell from favour with his ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP), was due to be repealed.

Some observers saw the repeal of this act as a move by the ruling MCP to protect some of its senior members from losing property they acquired through dubious means.

The Decency in Dress Act, much resented by young Malawians, was also to be repealed.

It bars women from wearing miniskirts, slacks or shorts, while men were not allowed to wear provocative garments like bell-bottom trousers.

Malawians to be disarmed

Blantyre — The process of disarming the Malawi Young Pioneers, the youth wing of the ruling Malawi Congress Party, is going ahead as planned, the National Consultative Council was told this week.

Some of the 1500 members of the movement, notorious for attacking opponents of government policy, might be considered for service in the police.

Banda loyalists and troops fight it out

BLANTYRE — Gunfire erupted in the Malawian capital Lilongwe yesterday as troops moved to disarm the Young Pioneers, the enforcement arm of President Kamuzu Banda's ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP). At least 16 Pioneers were reported killed.

The fighting broke out after troops attempted to carry out an order to disarm the Young Pioneers. The order was given by the Presidential Council, the three-man body set up to run Malawi after Banda was flown to South Africa for a brain operation in October.

The order came after two soldiers had been shot dead and two wounded by Young Pioneers in the northern town of Mzuzu on Wednesday. Trouble had broken out earlier when soldiers and Young Pioneers traded blows during a brawl in a Lilongwe club on Sunday.

There has long been ill-feeling between the army, which had remained largely aloof from politics while Banda maintained his one-party rule, and the Young Pioneers. The Pioneers were widely feared because of their harsh methods of extracting obedience to the dictates of the MCP.

Woedef away

The days of the Young Pioneers appeared to be numbered when the MCP was overwhelmingly beaten in a June referendum on multiparty democracy that Banda was forced to hold in response to pressure from Western countries unhappy with his regime's human rights abuses.

Diplomats indicated yesterday the fact that the army had moved against the Young Pioneers, and apparently remained loyal to the Presidential Council, augured well for the transition to multiparty democracy in Malawi. The first multiparty election in many years is due to be held in May.

Some analysts, however, saw yesterday's event as significant because the disarming of the Pioneers had been ordered by the Presidential Council, which is headed by Gwanda Chakuamba.

Chakuamba became chairman of the council by virtue of his position as MCP secretary-general, an appointment made by Banda after wooing Chakuamba away from the opposition United Democratic Front (UDF).

Chakuamba had joined the UDF when he was released from jail after serving most of a 23-year jail term ordered by Banda after Chakuamba had fallen out with him.

Before being jailed, Chakuamba had been leader of the Young Pioneers.

Neutralise

His appointment as chairman of the Presidential Council was seen by some analysts as a sign that he had wrested power from Minister of State for John Tembo, who had long been regarded as the power behind Banda.

The order to disarm the Pioneers could mean that Chakuamba and Tembo had agreed on the need to neutralise them to avoid their becoming an embarrassment in the election campaign. Or, it could mean that Chakuamba was imposing his will on Tembo.

Banda has not resumed power since returning to Malawi after his operation and is widely regarded as a spent force, impotently watching the power struggle between Tembo and Chakuamba.

The opposition parties, who won overwhelming support in the referendum in June, have since lost much of their potential power by refusing to unite against the MCP.

A Department of Foreign Affairs spokesman said in Pretoria yesterday that the South African embassy in Lilongwe had reported by telephone that all was quiet again in the capital and the authorities appeared to have the situation under control. There was no threat to the safety of any foreign nationals.
16 die as Banda troopers attacked

BLANTYRE — At least 16 people were killed in fighting between Malawian troops backed by helicopters and Young Pioneers in the capital, Lilongwe, after authorities ordered the army to disarm the paramilitary youths yesterday.

Witnesses said troops stormed buildings occupied by the Young Pioneers, a much-feared force traditionally used by ailing President Kamuzu Banda's Malawi Congress Party (MCP) to spy on Malawians and enforce obedience to one-party rule.

Gutted

Fighting lasted just over two hours. Witnesses counted at least 16 bodies outside several buildings stormed by the soldiers.

BLANTYRE — Gunfire erupted in the Malawian capital of Lilongwe yesterday as troops moved to disarm the Young Pioneers, the para-military arm of President Kamuzu Banda's ruling Malawi Congress Party (MCP), and at least 15 Pioneers were reported killed.

The order came after two soldiers had been shot dead and two wounded by Young Pioneers in the central town of Mzuzu on Wednesday.

Trouble had broken out earlier when soldiers and Pioneers engaged in fist fights as a club in Lilongwe on Sunday.

Army commander pledges loyalty to Banda

22 killed in Malawi as army, militia clash

Blantyre — The death toll in two days of clashes between Malawi's army and the ruling Malawi Congress Party's militia last week has risen to 22. External Affairs Minister Hetherwick Ntaka said yesterday.

He told a news conference that most of the dead — who included four soldiers, six Malawi Young Pioneers (MYP) militia members and 12 civilians — were from the capital Lilongwe, scene of a mini-war on Friday.

The Kamuzu central hospital has treated 109 casualties, 41 of whom are still in hospital.

Fighting between the army and the MYP militia, loyal to President Kamuzu Banda, was sparked off by the army, which raided MYP establishments on Friday in retaliation for the killing of two colleagues in the northern town of Mzuzu on Wednesday. The army then decided to carry out an unofficial disarmament of the MYP.

Meanwhile, following the clashes, army commander Isaac Yohane yesterday pledged his loyalty to Banda and said he was still in control of his forces.

The latest clashes in the country, currently undergoing transition to political pluralism after nearly three decades of authoritarian rule, sharply define the power struggle in Malawi.

The country is currently being ruled by a presidential council as Banda, believed to be in his 80s, is ill after recent brain surgery and preparations are under way for the country's first multiparty parliamentary and presidential elections.

Banda created the MYP in 1964. It became widely feared, acting as Banda's personal security guard and informers, and terrorised political dissenters.

But the ailing and ageing Banda has seen his grip on the country loosen dramatically since Western donor nations cut off aid last year to force him to introduce political and human rights reforms. — Sapa-AFP
LILONGWE — Gunfire crackled through Malawi's capital yesterday as soldiers fired warning shots to scare off looters after clashes killed 17 people and wounded 78, residents and diplomats said.

Soldiers continued their crackdown on the ruling party's paramilitary youth group, the Young Pioneers, sealing off a base outside the southern city of Blantyre, military officials said.

Fighting erupted in Lilongwe on Friday when government soldiers stormed the headquarters of the Young Pioneers, long hated for their role as brutal secret police and government vigilantes.

Earlier, Malawi's ruling presidential council ordered that the group be disarmed because of the killing of two government soldiers by Young Pioneers.

Malawi's young fighters have also caused problems over the past several years, allegedly committing crimes and engaging in unrest.

Meanwhile, hospital authorities said at least 15 people, most of them Young Pioneers, died and 78 people, mostly civilians, were wounded when Friday’s attempt to seize the youth group's headquarters led to battles.

On Saturday, the all-party National Consultative Council, a body overseeing political reforms, called on the government to hand power to an independent interim president ahead of multiparty elections scheduled next May.

Banda’s party claims it still controls Malawi

Argus Africa News Service
BLANTYRE — President Kamuzu Banda’s Malawi Congress Party government says it remains in full control of the country.

Its claims come after its armed wing, the Malawi Young Pioneers, was routed in bloody clashes with the army over the weekend in which at least 22 died and more than 100 were wounded.

But military sources said there was a possibility of the army seizing power in what would be this country’s first coup since independence in 1964.

The sources said elements in the army were unhappy that the MCP had remained in power after being overwhelmingly defeated last June in a referendum on whether the country should switch from one-party rule to multiparty democracy.

The dissident elements were also said to be dissatisfied with the army commander, General Isaac Yohane.

A list of grievances is reported to have been handed by disident soldiers to the government.

General Yohane yesterday reiterated his loyalty to the government, which claimed still to have the backing of most of the armed forces.

The government rejected demands by opposition party members in the National Consultative Council (NCC) that it resign and that General Yohane be dismissed for failing to control his troops in the weekend violence.

The NCC was set up to give the opposition a role in government after the June referendum but the real power is in the hands of the three-man Presidential Council that was set up by the ruling party to take over President Banda’s functions after he went to South Africa for brain surgery in October.

President Banda is believed to have been sidelined. The two most powerful figures in the country now are Presidential Council chairman Gwanda Chakuamba and Minister of State John Tembo, who is also a member of the council. It is not clear which of them wields more power.

After riding high immediately after the October referendum, the opposition parties have lost the initiative through squabbling and disunity.

Zimbabwe, SA friends again

HARARE — While formal diplomatic relations have yet to be restored, the meeting between the South African and Zimbabwean foreign ministers means that Pretoria and Harare are friends again.

Pik Botha and Nathan Shamuyarira are pictured on the front page of the main newspaper, The Herald, with headlines proclaiming a new chapter in relations between the two countries.

The editor, Tommy Sithole, went to Messina to cover the meeting.

Diplomatic ties were broken by Zimbabwe soon after independence in 1980 and in the decade that followed there were no harsher critics of South Africa than President Robert Mugabe and Mr Shamuyarira.

Mr Shamuyarira said yesterday that Zimbabwe was vigorously pursuing a policy of good neighbourliness.

Mr Botha said he was glad the bitterness was over and he hoped the meeting would lead to greater unity in the whole of Southern Africa.
No agreement to share power in Malawi

I refer to the article “Malawi ‘boss’ but for how long?” (The Star, November 3)

I would like, in the first instance, to inform your readers that the Malawi government did not agree to share power with the opposition as a result of the national referendum held on June 14.

Your readers should know that the purpose of the referendum was to enable the people of Malawi to decide on the political system they wanted to follow, whether to continue with the one-party system under the Malawi Congress Party (MCP) or to opt for political pluralism. The referendum had nothing whatsoever to do with the changing of government. The need for government to share power with the opposition did not and does not arise.

The members of the Presidential Council were appointed in accordance with the provision of the Malawi constitution, to serve during His Excellency the Life President’s hospitalisation and convalescence. His Excellency the Life President has made a good recovery.

The MCP has fulfilled all the promises that it has made to the people of Malawi since it came to power. The opposition groups rode on the crest of falsehood and unfulfilled promises. They have, therefore, not been able to erode the popularity that the MCP enjoys throughout the country.

The outcome of the general elections to be held under political pluralism will therefore be decided by the Malawians themselves. Your newspaper’s opinion on the election results is therefore premature to predict the outcome of the elections.

The decision to appoint the Hon Gwanda Chakuamba as Secretary-General of the Malawi Congress Party was taken by His Excellency the Life President in his capacity as Life President of the Malawi Congress Party. To instigate that Hon John Tembo, Minister of State in the President’s Office and Treasurer-General of the Malawi Congress Party, had a role in the appointment is not only wrong but misleading as well.

I also wish to inform your readers that Mama C Tamanda Kadzamira is not a politician. She is a civil servant, as the Official Government Hostess, and cherishes no political ambitions. It is, therefore, wrong and impudent for your feature writer to ascribe a political role for Mama C Tamanda Kadzamira. Mama C Tamanda Kadzamira is respectable throughout Malawi for her loyalty and dedication in executing her responsibilities as Official Government Hostess.

Banda fit, set to return to rule in Malawi

Blantyre — President Kamuzu Banda is now fit to resume his duties and the presidential council which has ruled Malawi since early October has been dissolved, the state-controlled radio announced early today.

Banda in move to stop clashes

BLANTYRE — Malawian President Kamuzu Banda, who resumed office on Tuesday after recovering from brain surgery, said he would appoint a defence minister following clashes between the army and Young Pioneers of the ruling party.

“I intend to appoint a minister of defence very soon. This is to make sure that the needs and the requirements of the army are looked after at cabinet level,” said Banda, who has held the defence portfolio for nearly three decades.

Banda, speaking on state radio on Tuesday night in his first address to Malawians since 22 people were killed in clashes between the army and his paramilitary youth wing, said he deeply regretted the loss of life as a “national tragedy.”

Banda, believed to be in his 90s, dissolved the three-man presidential council set up to rule Malawi in October while he was in hospital to have excess fluid removed from his brain.

He has ruled Malawi with an iron fist since independence from Britain in 1964. But his grip on power has been slipping since June, when an overwhelming majority of Malawi’s 9.7 million people voted to end his autocratic one-party rule.

The multiparty National Consultative Council, which is charting a transition to democracy after nearly 30 years of one-party rule, called at the weekend for the dismissal of the ruling council and the appointment of an interim president.

The NCC said the presidential council had lost control of the army after ordering it to disarm the Malawi Young Pioneers, the 7 000-strong youth wing of Banda’s Malawi Congress Party.

Troops were ordered on Friday to disarm the pioneers after two soldiers were killed by the paramilitaries in the town of Mzuzu last Wednesday.

Banda fires army chief and key deputies

Lilongwe — Malawian President Kamuzu Banda has sacked his army commander and two key deputies in an apparent attempt to defuse political tensions in the country.

General Isaac Yohane and two deputies were said at the weekend to have been "retired on health grounds."

Last week, the National Consultative Council, a body set up to oversee the transition process, called for the removal of Yohane.

Meanwhile, there is growing concern over the whereabouts of about 7,000 Young Pioneers, militiamen from the ruling Malawi Congress Party, who fled into the bush when soldiers began disarming them more than a week ago.

And Malawi's opposition claimed victory yesterday in a dispute with the government over who would succeed Banda.

The government agreed to reconvene parliament as soon as possible to abolish constitutional provisions for a three-man caretaker presidency drawn from the ruling party, said opposition spokesman Aleke Banda.

Such a group had ruled Malawi until last week, while the president was recovering from brain surgery.

Strike called off in Malawi

Blantyre — Malawi's opposition, conceding to a court injunction, yesterday called off a three-day general strike planned to begin today and designed to force President Kamuzu Banda's government to accept its tough conditions on the powers of an acting president.

Fred Nselu, current chairman of the opposition-dominated National Consultative Council (NCC) which is overseeing the transition to democracy, said four of the five opposition parties had asked him to call off the strike "just to show the government that, unlike them, we do respect court orders."

He said the opposition had also taken into consideration the country's fragile security situation. "We don't want to derail the democratization process," he said.

Malawi's High Court made an order on Saturday preventing the opposition from declaring the strike and from encouraging or directing any person to strike.

Justice Duncan Tambala, who granted the order, said he was satisfied the intended mass action would cause hardship in industry and commerce, with essential services being disrupted.

Nselu said the opposition in the NCC would continue to press the government to accept its conditions that the acting president would not have powers to declare war, or a state of emergency, and would not stand for the May 17 election.

Talks between the government and the opposition on these conditions broke down on Saturday.

Malawi gets warning on foreign aid

BLANTYRE — Donors and diplomats in Malawi have expressed concern over the political impasse in the country and have warned that if there is a breakdown in dialogue between the government and the opposition, assistance programmes will be stopped.

According to Mr Fred Nchula, chairman of the National Consultative Council, a body set up to oversee the transition process, this warning was issued at a meeting last week.

He said the donors' meeting in Paris later this month would review progress made in the transition towards democracy, and would almost definitely stop any assistance programmes if dialogue was stopped.

Donors resumed aid to Malawi in September after having suspended all but humanitarian assistance because of the country's human rights violations.

BLANTYRE — Donors and diplomats in Malawi have expressed concern over the political impasse in the country — and have warned that if there is a breakdown in dialogue between government and the opposition, assistance programmes would be stopped.

According to Fred Neula, chairman of the National Consultative Council, a body set up to oversee the transition process, this warning was issued at a meeting last week.

He said the Consultative Group of donor meeting in Paris later this month would review progress made in the transition towards democracy.

Donors resumed aid to Malawi in September after having suspended all, but humanitarian assistance because of human rights violations.

But, since the referendum in June, in which the majority of the country rejected President Kamuzu Banda's one-party rule, Malawi has made slow progress towards democracy and elections to be held in May next year.

Several laws have been repealed to improve the environment for democracy, and Amnesty International has declared that Malawi was now more human rights friendly than most African countries.
Big pay hikes for directors of SA firms

SA companies are still awarding their top management salary increases that far outstrip the fortunes of their shareholders.

Figures drawn from the 1993 annual reports for 20 of SA’s largest groups showed 15 companies awarded their boards salary increases exceeding growth in shareholders’ earnings or dividends.

Six companies’ directors bagged increases of more than 20%, four received more than 30%, and two — including Barlow Rand, formerly SA’s largest group — awarded rises of more than 40%. Engen’s board was given a 50% raise last year.

Fourteen companies awarded pay rises to boards above last year’s inflation rate.

None cut board salaries.

In contrast to European and US reporting practice, few companies break down individual salary raises. There is also limited distinction between basic salary and extras, such as bonuses, pensions or payoffs to departing board members.

Several large increases are also due to board changes, with companies such as Iscor undergoing a major shake-up.

But the figures nevertheless show there is little clear link between a company’s performance and money spent in the boardroom. Many directors also received large salary rises while their companies were battling to bring down costs, and shedding thousands of jobs in the process.

The salary rise at Engen, which took combined executive pay from R1m to R1.4m, accompanied a 15% rise in dividends and earnings for 1993. The energy company’s board netted a 30% salary increase in the previous year.

Barlow Rand lifted total board pay from R15m to R21m. Two executives joined the board during the year, in which earnings a share dropped 15% and the dividend — which has risen just 3% since 1989 — was held.

Absa lifted board pay 26% to R6.4m — outstripping more than threefold the rise in earnings and dividends. Two directors left the board and nearly 6 000 staff members were retrenched.

Mabola lifting boardroom pay 33% to R2.6m, while earnings a share grew 7.8% and the dividend 4.5%. The Iscor board netted a 5% rise to R2.2m, despite a sharp fall in earnings and dividends. The raises at both companies were due in part to board changes, though both also awarded their boards large increases for the 1992 financial year.

Sasol’s boardroom pay jumped 28% to R12m, double the rise in earnings a share. The increase came as the company retrenched 4 400 staff members.

Murray & Roberts, SA Breweries, Keraf, Safcon, Rembrandt Group and Hunt Lenchars & Hepburn, also gave their boards raises above the companies’ gains in earnings and dividends, and the inflation rate.

The OK Bazaar board netted a rise of 8% to R5.3m, while earnings plummeted 58% and the dividend dropped below three quarters.

Seetaram, Anglovaal Industries, Nampak and Premier Group gave their board raises below the inflation rate and the gains in earnings or dividends.
