Clothing industry 'not competitive' (184)

By AUDREY D'ANGELO
Business Editor

A TENDENCY for the local clothing market to grow and the export market to diminish is "disturbing," says Arnold Werbeloff, National Clothing Federation of SA (NCF) economist.

He warns clothing manufacturers, in the NCF newsletter, that with the lowering of protective import tariffs "firms which do not achieve international competitiveness are likely to fall by the wayside."

"Exporting is the key to achieving international competitive advantage. Thus it is vital that the opportunity for entering world markets is taken while the local market base is still secure."

NCF director Henrie van Zyl said yesterday that uncertainty about the continuation of the General Export Incentive Scheme (GEIS) had made it difficult to plan ahead for exports last year.

Now that the industry had been assured GEIS would continue the picture had changed and the NCF was undertaking two major measures to encourage exports.

It was preparing for the first Southern African clothing exhibition, in which manufacturers from neighbouring states would also take part, in Midrand in April.

It was also organising a think tank at which the 50 largest clothing exporters in SA would discuss the formation of a Clothing Export Council to promote clothing exports at national level.

Other major exporting countries, such as Britain, had such councils.

In addition to this activity the NCF had prepared a guide to exporting clothing to 40 countries. It included the names, addresses, telephone and fax numbers of the 10 largest retailers and wholesalers of clothing in each of the 40 countries, average retail prices and expenditure on clothing as a proportion of gross domestic product.
Clothing prices to rise 12%

THE price of clothes is expected to increase by more than 12% this year, putting pressure on the inflation rate.

The industry’s labour costs, in terms of new wage agreements, and the cost of raw materials are destined to soar.

But “horrible” retail margins are equally to blame, say industry sources.

Price hikes of this magnitude will make clothing even less affordable to a large percentage of the community and are well above the average increase last year of about 3.5% reported by the Central Statistical Service.

Retailers say, however, that prices moved up by between 7% and 9% last year.

Textile manufacturers, ordering for the winter, are faced with rising raw material costs. Wool prices have risen by 78%, mohair by 56% and man-made fibres and cotton by similar percentages.

To counter the impact of these increases, clothing manufacturers insist that import duties on yarns, fibres and textiles be slashed.

“Greater use of lower priced imports would contribute greatly to the ability of the clothing industry to supply more affordable clothing,” says the National Clothing Federation.

The Textile Federation says, however, that import duties make up only a small portion of the retail price of clothes.

Following actual case studies through the production pipeline, the Textile Federation says that import duty on a ladies’ skirt adds only 3.1% to the retail price of R89.99. On a R47.99 knitted, printed polyester/cotton children’s play suit, duties add 2%. On a men’s woven printed shirt the duty increases the price of R90 by 2.8% and 5.1% on a men’s polyestercotton shirt costing R99.99.

Rather, says the Textile Federation, high retail margins are the main culprit for the soaring price of clothes.

Syd Vianello, senior analyst for stockbrokers Ed Hern Rudolph, says retail margins vary between 80% and 150% with the average running at about 125%.

“On the upper end of the scale, the margin is increased to cover financing costs, where goods are sold on credit. These remain a major contributor to high clothing prices. It must also be borne in mind that current duty levels on imported clothing are 90%,” he says.

NCF chief economist Arnold Werbeloff concedes that clothing prices will rise by between 10% and 11%, with higher input costs leading to increased ex-factory costs. Retail margins will remain at about the same level as last year.
Rag trade offer to aid customs

THE textile industry has proposed that it and the allied clothing industry provide personnel and financial resources to help the customs and excise departments improve customs control.

Textile Federation (Textex) president Mervyn King said yesterday customs and excise officials did not have the capacity to police customs regulations properly.

It was therefore necessary for the industry to get involved in combating dumping and illegal imports.

King said the customs structure was abused by the use of random sampling, while there was insufficient personnel to man the necessary posts.

"Unscrupulous traders take advantage of the situation, which is a threat to the industry," he said.

The industry was prepared to provide experts who would be able to assist the customs department in policing customs regulations.

National Clothing Federation (NCF) executive director Benna van Zyl said Textex had tabled the customs proposals.

The NCP supported the concept, but would get involved only once the tariff issue had been settled.

"It would not make sense to push the customs issue while we do not have any conclusion on the tariff structure," he said.

The Swart panel, which investigated both industries, recommended that customs and excise operations and anti-dumping measures be upgraded. The panel said the unsatisfactory situation was a government shortcoming and the operations could become self-financing.

King said the local textile industry was in a much better shape than a year ago.

Companies' order books were much fuller.

He predicted that when Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel announced the long-term plan for the textile industry, "wisdom would prevail."

The upturn in the economy and 1994's cold winter have stimulated new growth at Adonis Knitwear A dividend was paid for the first time since 1991 and EPS climbed to 9.0c (from 0.9c in 1993). Attributable profit rose sharply to R520 335 (R30 487 in 1993) Thus is still well below the nine-year high of R2.4m in 1990, which indicates considerable potential for the future

The clothing sector appears to be heading upward in the wake of the economic recovery, taking raw material suppliers and manufacturers of retail goods with. Within the general upturn, natural fibres such as wool and silk are experiencing a resurgence in popularity Adonis financial director

Steven Chael predicts this demand will peak around the winter of 1995, due mainly to the short life cycle of high-fashion goods. The company is investing in sophisticated new machinery in an attempt to anticipate the next fashionable trend.

Adonis has a respectable track record for the investor interested in stable holdings. It has survived 26 years in a business highly susceptible to the vagaries of the economy, has been profitable for much of that time and is proud of its good reputation with customers and suppliers.

However, the company draws the line at openness when it comes to declaring turnover (see box) Notes to the financial statements say the directors consider that "such disclosure would not be in the interests of the company." The discerning investor may wonder what the company is hiding — only margins, says Chael, to protect itself. "Competition is a significant and real problem," he adds, which results in relatively high levels of non-disclosure in the clothing industry amid strong suspicions of industrial espionage.

That's all very well but the absence of a turnover figure for Adonis may adversely influence analysts and potential investors, who measure the health of a business by its profit margins. The share price stands at 106c against a NAV of 200c, a low valuation even when the recent problems in the industry are taken into account.

Return on capital remains weak at 5.6% and EPS are well below those of 1990 and 1991. Nonetheless, Adonis's return to profitability with indications for growth in the near future could make this an attractive short-term buy.
CLOTHING manufacturer Rex Trueform's venture into the retail market through the Queenspark clothing chain could be having a negative effect on its clothing manufacturing operation, market sources said at the weekend.

Textile sources said the Queenspark venture was operating in direct competition with two of Rex Trueform's main clients, Woolworths and Edgars.

However, chairman Stewart Shabb said the problems Rex Trueform had with Woolworths had been resolved and were "now history".

Shabb said the company had an excellent relationship with Edgars, which was a major client. Trade with Woolworths was also going well.

Shabb said the company was poised to benefit further as the duty credit certificate scheme had been extended.

The company has a major export market.

The government must take decisive action on the vexed question of clothing and textile tariffs, even if the consequences are unpopular, says Pep Stores MD Henness Smaal.

Speaking at the Textile Institute's chairman's evening, Mr Smaal said: "The government needs to take responsibility for framing a policy that favours the national interest, not sectional interests."

"The previous government, which was unwilling to take unpopular decisions, adopted a consensus approach which was doomed to fail."

"Up to now, the government has tried to get the parties together and say 'You sort it out', but its interests are irrevocably in conflict."

Tariff decisions should form part of a national industrial policy whose adoption was essential if South African manufacturing was to become internationally competitive, Mr Smaal argued.

A central export-promotion infrastructure should be established. "In Taiwan there's a 20-storey government building devoted to promoting textile and clothing exports, but in South Africa the small manufacturer has nowhere to go."
Clothing sector capex set to soar

THE National Clothing Federation expected capital expenditure projects to double to R100m this year, executive director Hennie van Zyl said recently.

The boom in the clothing industry was set to affect small to medium enterprises in a ripple effect as bigger firms subcontracted to such operations.

Van Zyl said the industry was quite bullish and discussions with industry leaders, the Industrial Development Corporation and industry consultants indicated a 100% jump in capex against last year.

He said during the recession the industry had postponed investments in new plant and machinery.

"Even during the current boom a variety of firms subcontracted to smaller enterprises, rather than invest in new machinery. This has had the effect of boosting employment in the informal and small-business sector, a goal which is central to the reconstruction and development programme," he said.

However, the limits of this strategy had been reached and the industry was investing in equipment. A further boost to employment had come from foreign investment and export orders.

Van Zyl said examples were the Levi Strauss manufacturing operation being set up in Cape Town and the three export factories AM Mooda was establishing in KwaZulu/Natal.

He noted the industry was the least capital intensive in SA.

Van Zyl said there was a shortage of capital in SA, and that it was important to invest in labour intensive projects.
Pals has its best year yet

YURI THUSNBRAN

CAPE-based clothing manufacturer Pals Holdings was looking at a rosy future with its order book reasonably full, despite its margins remaining under extreme pressure, chairman and joint MD Selwyn Kagan said in the company's annual report.

Kagan said that with SA now apartheid-free, its clothing was accepted throughout the world. This had stimulated many new inquiries.

"To be successful in converting these inquiries into orders, we must be able to compete on quality, price and service against other major exporting countries, most of whom had the advantage of either reduced or duty-free entry into the US and Europe," he said.

Unlike foreign competitors, SA faced the problem of long lead times in securing raw materials. Local mills were fully booked five to six months in advance and many foreign mills had increased their lead time to 78 days. $0.9 1.1 5

He said the supply of raw materials during the review period was extremely difficult, with fabric suppliers running up to six weeks late. Textile suppliers were now delivering far closer to contracted dates.

In the year to June, turnover rose 54% to R33.5m, resulting in net operating income increasing 113% to R1.5m and earnings a share surging 199% to 19.2c.

Kagan said the performance was the company's finest in its 61 years of trading and seven years as a listed company.
Allwear MD optimistic

CLOTHING manufacturer Allwear was set to benefit from the surge in the number of black schoolchildren, which increased demand for uniforms, MD Jorge Jordaan said yesterday.

Jordaan said the company, which manufacturers school clothes, expected this trend to have a positive effect on earnings for the year to December to be announced next week.

He expected the black schoolgoing population to grow from 5-million at the end of last year, to 18-million by the end of the year 2009, he said.

Chairman Selwyn Kagan is presumably accurate when he says financial 1994 was the finest in Pals’ 61 years of trading, seven of them listed. Anyhow, never since the listing has there been more than a few percentage points increase in earnings or share price.

The more than doubling in trading profit and earnings masks many of the difficulties Pals faced last year. Kagan says the supply of raw materials became extremely difficult, with the fabric suppliers running up to six weeks late. Of the five SA textile mills, where Pals sources 90% of its raw materials, one withdrew from the market for six months but has re-emerged. Textile suppliers, he says, are now in the main delivering far closer to contracted delivery dates.

Contrary to overseas competitors in the export market, SA faces the problem of excessive lead times in securing raw materials. Local mills are fully booked for five to six months in advance, while many foreign mills have increased their lead time to only 75 days.

Another hurdle is that, apartheid free, SA clothing is accepted internationally; this has stimulated many new inquiries. But to convert these inquiries into orders, Pals must be able to compete on quality, price and service against other major exporting countries, most of which have the advantage of either reduced or duty-free entry into the US and Europe.

Also, GEIS benefits are to be scaled down over the next three years. Kagan says margins are still under extreme pressure and “we do not expect the situation to improve in the immediate future.”

Meanwhile, Pals’s balance sheet is strengthening. Gearing halved but debt — the lowest in several years — must have been reduced only towards year-end, interest paid climbed from R655 000 to R1m. Debts fell R59 000, while creditors rose by R368 000. Stock increased by only 14% against the 34% rise in turnover.

Based on the success of existing activities last year, Pals has been able to expand into other areas of complementary business.

Including ladies’ wear, which is already contributing profit. The share soared from 24c to 120c in 1994, before correcting to 100c and a p/e of 5.2.

This looks cheap but it needs to be shown that the earnings recovery will be sustained.

Top jeans maker plans city factory

By AUDREY D'ANGELO
Business Editor

LEVI-STRAUSS, manufacturer of the world's best-selling jeans, plans to set up a factory in Cape Town which will export to the rest of Africa and to Europe in addition to supplying the SA market.

The international company's business development director, Claude Flauraud, said at the weekend that it would be "a multimillion dollar investment" but he preferred not to disclose the capacity of the proposed factory or the number of jobs it would create.

He said Levi-Stauss, which sold 250 million pairs of jeans a year worldwide, preferred to locate its factories near the market they would serve and had seven in Europe alone.

The reason jeans would be exported from Cape Town to Europe had nothing to do with comparative production costs. The arrangement would provide the factory with an additional stream of business while the market in southern and central Africa grew.

Flauraud said the project was "still pretty much at the preparatory level. We don't have a factory, a needle or a piece of denim in Cape Town yet. It is all still on paper.

A number of sites had been looked at and we are pretty advanced on one of them" but nothing had yet been signed.

The retention or removal of exchange control was "not a major consideration for us. Our decision (to come here) has already been made."

The company was not deterred by suggestions that productivity in SA factories was low. "Productivity has nothing to do with people. It has more to do with the way factories are laid out, and the tools and machinery available. We expect productivity to be the same here as anywhere else."

Discussing the size of the African market, Flauraud said the SA market was an interesting one "and even today is far from negligible."

Other parts of Africa varied. The Maghreb and Egypt were already maturing markets but sales were lower in some parts of Central Africa where consumers' incomes were still generally low.

Flauraud said the company had recently entered markets in Poland, Czechoslovakia and the former Soviet Union where per capita income was not so different from Southern Africa. But conditions were changing and "rapidly a fair number of consumers have been able to go for Levi-Stauss jeans."

Wesgro, the development agency of the Western Cape, has been involved in the project. Wesgro CEO David Bridgman said the Levi-Stauss factory would "strengthen Cape Town's image as a centre of the up-market clothing industry."
Seardel earnings jump by 60%

By AUDREY D'ANGELO

EXCELLENT results from clothing manufacturer Seardel Corporation, which lifted attributable earnings by 60.6% in the six months to December, reflect the upturn in consumer spending.

Earnings at share level rose by 37.1% to 94c (80c) in spite of the capitalisation award in lieu of cash dividends in November, which increased the issued share capital by 522,242 shares.

The capitalisation award was equivalent to a cash dividend of 12.5c a share, compared with 7c in the first half of 1994. Shareholders may elect to receive a cash dividend instead for all or part of their holding.

Operating income rose by 33.2% to R47.2m. Pre-tax income rose to R32m (R20.9m) and after-tax income by 52.9% to R22.4m (R14.6m).

This was achieved on a 25.9% rise in turnover to R782.6m (R621.5m). Chairman Aaron Searl pointed out yesterday that this rise of R160m was in domestic sales, since export levels had remained static, and was achieved with existing capacity.

without any new acquisitions. “We invested R8m in high-technology equipment, but we built no new factories. “This reflects the continued improvement in retail trading, which is mirrored in our group’s results.” He said that, barring unforeseen circumstances, he was revising the forecasts in the 1994 annual report upwards. He now expected turnover for the current year to be R1.5bn instead of the forecast R1.3bn, with earnings per share of 170c and dividends of 94c.

The phasing out of protective tariffs for the clothing industry would be gradual, over 10 years, “and thus will give us ample time to adjust.”

However, “the clothing and textile industries still await the decision of Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel regarding the phasing down of tariff levels within our GATT (General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade) commitments.”

“The clothing industry calls for an accelerated phase-down on tariffs on its primary input costs of fibres, yarns and textiles in order to obtain its inputs at world-related prices”.

Searl said rising costs of raw materials would have to be passed on to the consumer.

“I am delighted with our performance. But, having said that, we still have only a 4% margin to turnover which is below our target of 8%”

Levi tries to dispel counterfeiting blues

MULTINATIONAL Levi Strauss, which recently arrived in SA, is cracking down on counterfeiting which has flourished during the organisation's absence from SA.

In six raids yesterday in the Johannesburg area, more than 400 pairs of counterfeit Levi jeans were seized by the police commercial unit. Another 1 600 pairs were seized in similar raids in Durban and Cape Town over the past two weeks.

The campaign is a prelude to local manufacture of the brand in SA. Until now, Levi Strauss had not officially traded in SA nor acted against local infringement of its trademark. Levi Strauss assistant corporate security director Henke Roeland said. As a result, the volume of counterfeit jeans flooding the SA market rose to levels comparable with the Eastern bloc and countries like Turkey.

Preliminary investigations showed that at least 90% of retail outlets selling "Levis" were selling copies, he said.

Attorneys Webber Wentzel, who are acting for Levi Strauss in its anti-piracy campaign, have sent out more than 60 letters of demand. Patent attorney Lawrence Reyburn said what was encouraging, however, was the extent of compliance once retailers become aware of the situation.

Roeland, who has 20 years of experience in international fraud, was flown out from Brussels to head security operations in SA.

Stores under investigation range from the most exclusive to everyday shops in working-class areas. Quite a sizable number of shops are involved.

Roeland said 90% of fake Levis were coming from Thailand and China. The rest were made in SA, Swaziland and Lesotho.
Turnaround for SA Bias

JOHANNESBURG — A strong second half performance by clothing accessory and trimming company SA Bias Holdings turned a first half slump in attributable income to a nearly nine percent improvement for the year as a whole.

Reporting yesterday for the year ended December, SA Bias stated attributable income in the first half of 1994 had been down about 20% relative to the previous year because of the disruptions during the election period, and operating losses in one of the group’s six divisions.

A good second half comeback saw SA Bias recoup this deficit and complete the year with attributable income and earnings per share 9.8% higher than in the previous year.

Net income before taxation was 18.8% higher but an increase in the average tax rate from 25% to 35% reduced the improvement in earnings per share to 35.9c (33.0c).

A final dividend of seven cents a share was declared — Sapa
Second half reverses decline by SA Bias

A STRONG second half performance enabled trimmings, accessories and components manufacturer SA Bias Industries (SA Bias) to reverse its first half decline and report a 9% earnings rise to R35.2c (32c) a share for the year to end-December.

This was above the directors' forecasts made at the interim stage.

They said attributable income was about 20% down in the first half due to disruptions over the elections, operating losses in one of SA Bias's six divisions and a higher effective tax rate. At the end of July, SA Bias had indicated that June and July turnovers had been strong, and that it would trade within budgets in the second half.

The second half performance had enabled the group to more than recoup the first half deficit.

Turnover for the full year increased by 12% to R215.6m from R192.5m previously. Margins improved, and operating income was 19% up at R21.7m (R18.2m).

Pre-tax income was 19% higher at R17.5m (R15.1m). But an increase in the average tax rate saw attributable income rise by only 10% to R10.5m from R9.4m previously. The full year dividend was maintained at 11c a share.

Directors said divisions were performing well "for the first time since the recession ended". Since year-end, SA Bias had merged some of its divisions "to facilitate improved customer service".

SA Bias had previously equity-accounted its 50% interests in offshore companies International Trimmings and Barbour Peruvale Threads. But it was about to acquire a majority interest in the former, and an SA Bias director was now the MD of the latter. In this light, the operations have been consolidated and the previous year's results restated.

A "satisfactory improvement" in earnings and dividends was expected in financial 1995. The share closed yesterday at 250c, near its yearly high of 270c.

SA Bias had resumed earnings growth in financial 1993 after dropping earnings for the first time in 14 years the previous year.
SA Bias props up Sabhold with second-half showing

A STRONG second-half performance by subsidiary SA Bias enabled industrial group Sabhold to limit its earnings decline to 7% in the year to end-December.

The group, whose main interests are its 88% stake in trimmings and accessories company SA Bias and its 62% interest in investment group Merhold Investment Corporation, reported 7% lower attributable income of R1m (R17.2m), translating into earnings of 82.9c (69.4c).

Earnings were 25% lower at the interim stage as disruptions during the election affected SA Bias and conversion of debentures diluted Merhold's earnings.

Turnover for the year dropped 5% to R232.5m (R246.3m).

Directors said, however, these figures were not strictly comparable, as financial year 1995 included finance operations previously owned by Merhold.

Prior year figures have also been adjusted as SA Bias has consolidated the previously equity accounted income of associates.

Pre-tax income reflected a marginal improvement to R28.7m (R28.5m), but a hike in the tax rate saw taxed income drop to R23.4m from R24.7m.

Directors said SA Bias was trading well, and its prospects for the current financial year were good. Merhold’s media and industrial interests should perform well, while its banking interests were likely to maintain earnings.

Sabvest, which owns 51% of Sabhold, reported earnings of 42.3c (45c) a share, and maintained its full year dividend payout of 13.5c a share.
Visiting expert advises govt to set up design council

CAPE TOWN — Government should consider establishing an industrial and commercial design council to form the link between local designers and manufacturers. That was the advice recently of International Council of Societies of Design board member Sanie Abdul.

Abdul said design promotion was crucial to the development of manufactured exports, and with the re-admittance of SA to world markets, design would begin to play an important role in export promotion.

Abdul said that in his country, Singapore, which had become a fast growing export-orientated manufacturing economy in spite of a total absence of raw materials, design was actively promoted by the government which offered incentives to encourage manufacturers to make use of local designers.

Efforts to promote commercial design included awards, the establishment by the Singaporean government of a design centre, and the holding of design competitions among schoolchildren, some as young as 11 years old, said Abdul.

If designs had to be imported to Singapore, the overseas designer was brought to that country so that skills could be transferred.
Property loopholes to tighten up

BY BRUCE CAMERON

Loopholes allowing billions of rand to slip through the tax net in complex property deals are likely to be at least partially restricted by Finance Minister Chris Liebenberg when he presents his Budget tomorrow.

The schemes have so far evaded the test of section 103 of the Tax Act, which permits the commissioner of inland revenue to ban avoidance schemes.

But the tax authorities have become increasingly concerned about tax consultants aggressively marketing the schemes.

The loophole involves companies selling off land to a developer who effectively sells the right of usage back. This enables the original owner to write off capital costs as little as one year.

Some recent schemes involve major property deals between top South African companies.

Local institu5ons...giving up...mixed signals towards the appearance or reappearance of international heavyweight banks in South Africa.

In some respects the foreign banks are welcome but local institutions expect increased competition in a number of areas.

Last week there were announcements from Holland's biggest bank, ABN Amro, and from the UK's Barclays Bank that they would be setting up full banking operations, concentrating on the corporate market.

Senior representatives of the international financial group Lehman Brothers also visited the country last week and announced they would probably set up a full branch, although not this year.

The consensus from local banks is that there will be increased competition in some areas but a number of foreign banks would in time discover the SA market was less profitable than they had hoped and scale up their activities.

Absa executive director responsible for corporate and merchant banking, Jean Brown, said it was difficult to comment on the possible effects of foreign entrants without knowing what conditions the SA Reserve Bank would attach to licences it granted.

Assuming full branches were permitted, three areas would be most affected: mergers and acquisition activity, there would be fierce competition to advise local companies wanting to expand abroad.

However, foreign banks would initially find it difficult to operate in the local environment.

On the trading side, more players would provide a more balanced market, Brown said.

Standard Corporate Merchant Bank MD Jackie Maree agreed, saying that more dealing rooms would be created.

Clothing coalition seeks safeguards

BY MORGAN NADEU

A coalition of the clothing industry's main players has been formed to establish safeguards for the industry's small, medium and macro enterprises (SMMES) which, they claim, are in danger of collapsing.

The Clothing Federation of South Africa, headed by tycoon Ahmed Sadek Vahed, regional clothing associations and the Sunnyside Group, which represents 70 small business interests, last night backed a proposal calling on the government to recognise and deal with the severe problems facing SMMES.

The plea comes just two weeks before President Mandela opens the watershed conference on SMMES - a meeting of small business lobbyists and Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel.

Durban businessman and Consultative Business Forum secretary Shurab Soro is heading a delegation in Gauteng where the proposals aimed at the short-term development of SMMES will be discussed.

Major points in the proposal include the recognition and active participation of SMMES in decision-making, repairing the financial damage caused by high tariff duties during the "Band Aid" period, clear definition of SMMES and wage payments based on productivity.

The document also outlines their intention to resist the textile monopolies.
Clothing giant nets big profit

MARTIN RUSHEMORE

HARARE — Pessimism about Zimbabwe's consumer market has failed to dent the fortunes of clothing group Edgars Stores, 59% owned by the SA chain of the same name.

Despite stubborn inflation of more than 25%, which has seriously eroded purchasing power, the manufacturer and retailer chalked up a 60% rise in net profit to R12m for the six months to the end of December.

Turnover was up 48% to R106m. A 12c dividend has been declared.

The company attributes the good results to more sophisticated store design and layout coupled with a wider product range.

The forecast for the full year is a better performance than the 1993 net profit of R15m.
Exports boost TEJ recovery

But margins still under pressure

JOHN VIJJOEN

CAPE Town knitwear and clothing manufacturer Towles Edgar Jacobs turned a R1,691 million attributable loss for the six months to December 1993, into a R483 000 attributable profit for the second half of 1994, owing mainly to exports.

The results for the half year were in line with budget, but margins were still not satisfactory and remained under pressure, the TEJ board said.

Sales were up 26 percent from the same period in 1993.

The improvements in the group income statements were owing largely to better asset utilisation and operating efficiencies resulting from increased exports.

Turnover rose 26 percent from the same period in 1993, from R13,7 million to R17,3 million.

Earnings a share was 15c for the six months, compared with a loss of 57,3c a share.

Managing director Tony Owen credited the improvement in the results to “consistent endeavour” over the past three years to reap the benefits of increased export volumes.

“In light of these results and the outlook to the end of the year, we are confident of an improvement for the full year, placing TEJ firmly on a path to sustained recovery,” Mr Owen said.

Significant changes in the TEJ balance sheet were the increases in fixed and current assets. Land and buildings were revalued last October to about R7 million.

An amount of R2,5 million had been transferred to non-distributable reserves. Current assets reflected the increased stocks required to support the greater manufacturing activity levels and sales for the second half of the year.

In spite of the pressure on margins, the budget for the second half of the year should be met, which would result in improved earnings on last year, the TEJ board said.

Taxi task force

ABOUT 250 representatives of taxi organisations throughout the country reached agreement at a meeting with government in Johannesburg to form a joint task group to investigate problems confronting the industry. Issues to be examined include road safety and driver discipline. Transport Minister Mac Maharaj addressed the meeting. (B1) 20/3/95

Pay talks deadlock

NEGOTIATIONS on wage increases for the year by the Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) and Shop Stewards deadlocked on Friday.

Sactwu said a Conciliation Board hearing would be held this week to try to find a solution. If the Conciliation Board was unable to resolve the dispute, the union would conduct a ballot on whether to strike. (B1) 20/3/95

SA eyes arms market

DEFENCE Minister Joe Modise is confident SA can sell locally designed military ware successfully on the international market. Speaking before leaving for the Abu Dhabi Defence Exhibition in the United Arab Emirates, he said SA would display its G-5 and G-6 weapons, laser range-finder, mine detection equipment and an array of naval vessels. Modise said several countries had approached SA saying they wanted to buy weapons, but he refused to identify them.

Modise was accompanied by Defence Force chief of staff Gen Wessel Kritzinger, Defence Secretary Pierre Steyn and Armcos chairman Johan Moolman.

French visit leads to trade deals

CAPE TOWN — The R860m of foreign aid pledged to SA by France, including contributions to European Union (EU) aid and, put the country among the front-runners of donor countries to SA, French Industry, Telecommunications and Foreign Trade Secretary Jose Rossy said on Friday.

Rossy was speaking at a briefing shortly before his return to France following a four-day visit to SA during which he met several national and provincial government and business leaders.

Agreements reached included the creation of a Franco-SA trade and industry commission, a R70m loan from the French Development Bank to the Development Bank of Southern Africa, renewal of the 1992 industrial co-operation agreement with the Industrial Development Corporation and the establishment of a Franco-SA engineering company, Legerop-Bergman.

During the visit French company Gemplus created a technical development and commercial subsidiary in Johannesburg and signed an agreement of association with a service company in the banking sector.

Rossy also presented SA trade and industry officials with a project to establish an institute of training for electronics, automation and telecommunications, with the support of the French government and businesses and in liaison with the Pretoria Technikon, for underprivileged students.

Rossy said France had increased its investment in SA in the past two years, while the number of French companies to have established operations in SA had grown from more than a 100 from only 13 in 1990.

In addition, a R110m financial aid package approved by the French government last week would complement loans from the French Development Agency, donations from the French foreign affairs ministry and from the French fund for the global environment announced by the French president in July last year.

Asked if France, during its chairmanship of the EU, would support SA's aim of joining Lome now that other development countries no longer objected to it, Rossy said: "France is not trying to block anything. France aims to facilitate the emergence of a sympathetic position."

He said SA's position with the EU would be determined by the 15 member states at the ministers' council in mid-April on the basis of proposals by the EU Commission.

Probe 'contravenes GATT'

AN INVESTIGATION by the Board on Tariffs and Trade into allegations of dumping of cheap footwear imports by Chinese firms could constitute a contravention of GATT provisions, a lawyer acting for the Chinese companies said at the weekend.

In a Government Gazette notice, the board said an investigation was being conducted into complaints lodged by the Footwear Manufacturers' Federation — representing SA manufacturers — that certain footwear classes originating from Hong Kong and China were being dumped on the SA market.

Webber Wentzel international trade partner Leora Blumberg, who is representing the Chinese firms, said there were four definitions of dumping in the Board on Tariffs and Trade Act. The board had invoked the fourth, which was contrary to GATT principles and would soon be repealed. "A draft Bill, which amends the definition of dumping to comply with GATT, has been introduced. In particular, the Bill removes the fourth definition of the Act."

A spokesman for the board said on Friday the investigation had not yet been completed.

Raw material cost hikes to hit clothing, textiles

Consumers and retailers should brace themselves for a steep hike in clothing and textile prices in the next month due to a year-on-year average cost increase of between 75% and 90% for fibre and raw materials, manufacturers said.

Frame group MD Walter Simeon said raw material prices had gone "haywire" and would affect clothing manufacturers, retailers and consumers. Cotton prices had risen 107% over the past 18 months.

The SA cotton crop, estimated last November at 250,000 bales, was now expected to yield only 160,000 bales because of the drought.

Simeon believed the trend would stabilise next year with a significantly improved crop, leading to lower cotton lint prices.

The price of polyester rose 123% to R2.55/kg year-on-year. Viscose rose to R2.20/kg ($1.50/kg) and acrylic jumped to R3.5/kg ($2.30/kg).

Textile Federation (Texfed) executive director Brian Brink said Texfed would be holding meetings soon with parties such as the Wool and Cotton Boards and synthetic fibre manufacturers to discuss the price increases. "We are in for a bumpy ride," he warned.

Romatek MD Mike Hankinson said wool prices rose between 70% and 120% year-on-year, largely because of reduced clips, poor weather conditions and increased off-take in China.

He said the increases were dictated by international price structures rather than domestic factors, and warned it was inevitable they would be passed on down the line. "There is no way that one industry can absorb all the increases."

Hankinson said there was a global shortage of polyester.

While increased demand for synthetic materials could be satisfied by building new plants, wool and cotton supply levels were dictated by weather conditions.
Plea from clothing industry

The Clothing Industry Federation yesterday issued an urgent plea for the lifting of tariffs on textile imports. Sadek Vahed, president of the federation, said the government was ignoring the plight of small and micro-clothing manufacturers and falling into the old pattern of supporting big business at the expense of textile firms. Vahed said the plea was made in anticipation of President Nelson Mandela's Durban Conference on Small Business to be held next week.
Not such royal growth

It's tough when, after trading efficiently enough to produce a jump in operating profits of 32%, a tax rate increase knocks earnings growth back to the mundane. On the surface, that's what happened to Rex Trueform Clothing (Rex) in the six months to December.

Chairman Stewart Shub seems reconciled to the inevitability of a continuing tax rate rise in the wake of reducing Geis rebates, not that these were directly responsible for the increase this time (Geis reductions only).

actual figure has never been exposed, Rex seems to be losing local market share in its traditional market. Sales to specialty retailers were maintained at the same level as a year ago. That's not healthy when retail clothing sales increased at an average rate of about 18.5% over the six months.

Shub is not likely to ignore this problem.

But while QP continues to prove such a success, it is not surprising it is the focus of his concentration and resources.

On the plus side, the latest legislation extending Geis and the Duty Credit Certificate Scheme incentives help to bring certainty back to the export effort, though Geis benefits are lower than before. With the uncertainties removed, export business should pick up again.

QP is being expanded further, production capacity is fully committed for the rest of the financial year and the second half always produces the better performance.

Shub says uncertainty surrounding the future of Geis incentives and other export/import costs compelled the group to turn away sizeable export business. Costing and therefore pricing for foreign clients was "an impossibility" not knowing what rulings would be issued by government in the short term. This accounted for the modest 11.5% turnover rise.

Shub says the result highlights the success of retail division Queens Park (QP), which opened three more small branches. He reckons QP is trading well and that, as it expands, better use of resources is producing greater efficiencies and ultimately better margins. QP made up turnover lost by unfilled exports.

Manuel tears a strip off the ragtrade

ALIDE DASNOIS
Deputy Business Editor

MINISTER of Trade and Industry Trevor Manuel has rapped clothing manufacturers on the knuckles as the fight over textile and clothing tariffs hots up again.

Mr Manuel was responding to remarks by Clothing Federation president Sadek Vahed, who accused him this week of giving in to the textile lobby.

The Clothing Federation (Clofed) and the Textile Federation (Texted) are at daggers drawn over the question of import tariffs on textiles, with clothing manufacturers claiming high import tariffs are stifling small clothing businesses.

The argument intensified in the past few days ahead of President Mandela's national Conference on Small Business to be held in Durban next week, with both Texted and Clofed claiming to have the interests of small businesses at heart.

The tariff issue is being examined by the minister at the moment.

Rumours — denied by the minister's office — that Mr Manuel was about to make a decision in favour of the textile industry, sparked angry reactions from the clothing lobby earlier this week.

"The Department of Trade and Industry," said the minister in a statement issued yesterday, "would find it decidedly helpful if the same supposedly anti-protectionist stance of Dr Sadek Vahed were consistently applied."

"The clothing sector currently enjoys at least twice the protection levels applied to the textile sector."

Mr Manuel said the binding level of tariffs on clothing, fixed at 45 percent in terms of South Africa's promises to the World Trade Organisation, was still double that on textiles.

"Rather than continually railing against the textile sector, we would invite Dr Vahed to support a move to reduce the tariff on clothing imports to 22.5 percent with immediate effect," he said.

Clofed is calling for a phase-down period of eight years for clothing, four years for fabrics and two years for fibres and yarns, while Texted and the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union would like to see tariffs on all three categories phased down over 10 years.

In his statement on Wednesday Dr Vahed accused the government of "continuing the oppressive legacy of the past" by maintaining textile tariffs and of "lending support to a monopoly industry above the interests of the majority of South Africans."

Clofed claims that small businesses are being bled by high import costs of fabrics and that consumers are suffering from unnecessarily high clothing prices.

Texted president Mervyn King denied the existence of textile monopolies.

In a statement yesterday, he said he was disappointed by Clofed's stance, especially since an agreement had been reached with Mr Manuel that the debate should not develop into a "slinging match."

The two industries had a symbiotic relationship and should pull together to ensure growth and job creation.

He welcomed the creation by the textile and clothing industries of a joint committee to help the development of small, medium and micro-enterprises.
Manuel warns the rag trade

YURI THUMBRAN

TRADE and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel has rapped the clothing industry across the knuckles for demanding a speedy reduction in tariffs on imported textiles.

 Manuel stepped in after the clothing manufacturers, led by National Clothing Federation president Sadek Vahed, launched an attack on the textiles industry and accused Manuel of bowing to the textiles “monopolies”. Manuel countered that demands for an end to protectionism could backfire on the clothing manufacturers, as it could lead to drastic cuts in the protection they enjoy from imports.

On Friday Manuel said the Trade and Industry Department would find it “decisively helpful” if Vahed’s proposals on the scaling down of tariffs for the textile industry were applied as consistently to the clothing industry.

“Rather than continually raising against the textiles sector, we would invite Vahed to support a move to reduce tariffs on clothing imports to 22.5% with immediate effect. The clothing sector currently enjoys at least twice the protection levels afforded to the textile sector,” Manuel said.

Manuel noted that this protection was retained throughout the Swart panel report on the clothing and textiles industries. He added that the GATT/World Trade Organization binding tariff level for clothing of 45% was still double that of textiles.

Vahed was undeterred by Manuel’s stance, saying his organisation would stick to its demands for the speedy phase-down on raw material tariffs.

The federation suggested a phase-down of two years on yarn and fibre, four years on fabric, and eight years for clothing. Vahed said the federation would react in more detail to Manuel today.

An industry analyst said Manuel’s statement was aimed at ending the fight between the two industries, which had been kept alive by the clothing manufacturers, rather than seriously warning the clothing industry to expect drastic tariff cuts.

He said despite Manuel’s harsh words there was no firm indication that the textile industry would get the 10-year phase-down it was seeking.

Textile Federation (Texted) president

YURI THUMBRAN

Mervyn King said the debate around the clothing and textile industries had to be kept factual and positive.

King said the textile industry remained committed to its request for a 3-year phase-down at the end of which the industry would be internationally competitive as a result of investment and training. He noted that GATT had agreed to SA having a 13-year period.

Referring to the clothing federation’s argument that a faster phase-down of inputs would generate more jobs in the labour intensive clothing industry, King said the textile industry contributed R1bn to SA’s balance of payments and was the sixth largest employer in the manufacturing sector. He said 90 000 jobs in the cotton industry were indirectly dependent on the textile industry.

Pals ups profits to R1,1-m

Deputy Business Editor

CAPE clothing company Pals Holdings produced dazzling results in the six months to December, more than doubling shareholders' profits to R1,1 million.

Turnover was up only 8 percent but stringent control over expenses, greater efficiency in production and an increase in exports helped the company boost net operating income 89 percent, directors said.

"These results are most gratifying and the second half of the year should produce satisfactory results," they said.

The interim dividend was passed but shareholders can look forward to a pay-out after the year-end.

Independent Newspapers has raised its stake in Argus Newspapers to 58 percent.

The group said holders of 10,5 million Argus shares had accepted the offer.

Before the bid of R13 in cash for each Argus share Independent Newspapers held 35 percent of Argus.

Electricity prices will rise four percent this year and next year's increase will also be below the inflation rate, Eskom chairman Jan Maree said in his annual address.

Dr Maree said the increase of 7 percent last year was in line with Eskom's goal of reducing real prices of electricity by 20 percent between 1992 and 1996.

Eskom reported net income up nearly 38 percent to R2,3 billion in the year to December.

Chief executive Allen Morgan attributed the strong results to a focus on efficiency and the curbing of operating costs. Operating expenditure rose 10,7 percent over the year.
Education changes 'boon for Allwear'

YURI THUMBREN

CLOTHING manufacturer Allwear was positioned to benefit from the increase in the number of pupils at traditional black schools, and from higher export levels, chairman Renier van Roojen said in his company's annual review for the year to December.

Allwear derives a major slice of its sales from the production of school uniforms, mostly for black pupils.

Continued capital investment in new technology saw the company increase exports from R1.8m in 1993 to just less than R10m in the past financial year.

Van Roojen said uniforms were a part of the culture of discipline: authorities were trying to inculcate in black schools.

He expected the major influx of pupils into Model C schools would mean further sales benefits for the company.

In Gauteng alone, 80,000 more pupils had enrolled at Model C schools.

The enrolment of black pupils was expected to leap 45% by 2004 - an increase of 5.2-million pupils.

"Taking this into account the company, being a dominant supplier of schoolwear, is positioned to benefit directly, and improved results are anticipated for 1995," he said.
DURBAN — More than 10 000 SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) members, demanding to see Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel, temporarily halted proceedings at yesterday's President's conference on small business.

Sactwu presented Manuel with a memorandum saying certain manufacturers, including AM Moolla group chairman and CEO Sadek Vahed, were attempting "to shape public policy to their narrow interests" and to promote job loss and large-scale closures of factories.

In response, Manuel said the long-standing fight between textiles and clothing had to be resolved as soon as possible, since "there are too many mouths depending on the outcome".

"Decisions taken about the future of the textile and clothing industries must be made with workers and management," he said.

There was no disagreement that the issues had to be resolved.

Sactwu, which represents 110 000 clothing workers, 50 000 textile workers and 10 000 footwear workers, called in its memorandum for carefully targeted financial assistance from the public sector and preferential treatment of small businesses in state procurement policies.
Ensign pick up the lost stitches

Deputy Business Editor

CAPE clothing manufacturer Ensign should break even by the end of the year after two years of losses, says chairman Ronald Roy.

After holding out against the recession longer than many other clothing companies, Ensign moved into the red two years ago with a loss of R214 000 in 1993.

Workers were retrenched as the group cut production in line with falling demand, especially from the public sector. Ensign's traditional market. But in spite of attempts to cut costs, the group's loss swelled to R1,99 million last year.

Competition put pressure on margins, and lower volumes made it impossible to recover overheads.

The demoralising effect of retrenchments in 1993, unexpected holidays at election time and outbursts of labour unrest all affected productivity.

But, Mr Roy says in his annual statement, strenuous efforts are being made to reverse the downward trend.

Changes to management are showing results in shopfloor efficiency, he says.

The forward-order book is improving and higher volumes since the upturn in the economy are reducing overheads.

"Barring unforeseen circumstances, we should break even by the end of the year and hopefully resume dividends in 1996," Mr Roy says.

But he warns that absenteeism still a worry and although the group is trying to keep stock levels down, "the vagaries of the market often frustrate our efforts."

Ensign manufactures uniforms, rainwear, overalls, workuits, protective clothing, leisurewear and fabrics.
Disputes obscure issues in textile, clothing sectors

Miriam Altman

Disputes obscure issues in textile, clothing sectors

THE public tussle between the Clothing Federation (Clofed), the Textile Federation and the Trade and Industry Department is generating more heat than light. This is only the latest in a series of disputes which have obscured the important issues these industries must face. It is crucial that a transparent and effective trade and industry policy be put in place for the benefit of SA to the global economy.

A year ago the clothing and textile industries, the SA Clothing and Textile Workers’ Union (Sactwau) and Trade and Industry put their names to a shared vision. This was an ambitious achievement for interest groups that had long been at loggerheads.

While Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel and his team deliberate on the merits of the Swart report’s tariff proposals, Clofed has broken ranks.

Clofed contends that textile tariffs are excessive and detrimental to the clothing industry, particularly small and medium-sized firms. Clofed also believes trade unions should be more transparent in their pursuit of favourable tariff increases, yet a large discrepancy exists between the official tariff and that actually paid. For example, in 1993, the average official tariff applying to clothing and textiles was 16% and 85%, respectively. However, the average that were paid tariffs were 8% and 14%. This unintended liberalisation began in 1989 with the introduction of the structural adjustment programme.

The tariff structure is irrational. Three-quarters of tariffs may apply to 2,000 tariff codes, depending on the weight and value of the product. The system assumes that all border posts are operated either on a computer system or by mathematicians with specialised training in textiles and clothing trade, and that textile tariffs should be reduced more rapidly than agreed so that the clothing industry is not prevented from expanding.

Despite the ease of product-switching at customs posts, the Swart report recommended that the system continue over the 10-year tariff phasing-down period. The approach to export promotion policy is equally perplexing. Internationally, duty-free import permits are offered to reduce exporters’ input costs to “world prices.” In contrast, the structural adjustment programme encouraged imports using its system of tradable duty import permits, allocated on the basis of export success.

Most permits were used to import clothing, particularly the most trade-sensitive clothing products to which the highest tariffs applied. Duty credit certificates replaced the structural adjustment programme in 1993. The certificates are not transferable, although the imports purchased may be sold in the market, allowing a similar result. Such certificates have been an important contributor to job losses in the clothing industry.

The new government should consider adopting a more balanced approach to industrial policy, incorporating trade policy into a wider framework. This approach would require cooperation between the main industries, the perception of each industry in the wider economy. Does it make sense to support one industry over another within a production pipeline? Both industries provide substantial employment opportunities. The clothing industry employs mostly women, while the textile industry offers greater employment stability. Yet these are not separate industries they form an interconnected network.

Local clothing exporters will need to bank on a domestic textile industry for a significant proportion of inputs. The competitiveness of both industries will depend on future investment in flexible textile machinery and improved production flow through this pipeline.

Should Trade and Industry lower the import price of textiles to favour small and medium-sized firms’ production and their supposed contribution to low-income markets? Complete liberalisation of clothing imports would be the most efficient method of lowering the price of clothing to consumers. China is the cheapest producer of low-cost garments. Liberalising textiles faster than clothing is beneficial for all clothing producers, regardless of market orientation. On the other hand, unfair competition in the context of weak anti-dumping safeguards could threaten local employment through the textile pipeline.

Clofed is rightly concerned about the tendency to give certificates on small businesses. Yet small firms are not the major employers in the clothing industry. About 85% of jobs are found in the 300 largest firms, each employing an average of 360 workers. Nor has it been established that small enterprises are the prime suppliers of low-cost goods to the poor. Some of the largest clothing producers such as Pepkor serve low-income consumers.

The Swart report recommended the continuation of duty credit certificates for a limited but unspecified period. Official guidelines on their use specify that exports will not be considered within this programme unless inputs are locally manufactured or imported on full duty. This protective measure is misplaced in an era of free trade. Duty credits are a tool to reduce exporters’ input costs to “world prices,” enhancing competitiveness in global markets. Instead, firms should be given access to export promotion schemes and support for the development of new equipment and machinery or human resource development that will allow for continued export activity once the export promotion scheme ends.

As the trade environment has been liberalised substantially since 1989, the remaining threat to the clothing and textile industries comes from very low-cost countries, particularly those with reputations for dumping. The tariff schedule must simply establish a price floor for imported goods. One duty should be applied to a greatly simplified tariff code.

The tariff of choice would be based on product weight, not value. Ad valorem tariffs are under-invoicing and have little effect on fragmented product such as clothing. Tariffs that are difficult to avoid, easy to calculate and acceptable in terms of GATT.

The clothing and textile industries would more beneficially exert effort and promoting policies to facilitate their long-term existence, keeping in mind GATT rules. Significant support for the expansion of the export marketing assistance programme and possibly the introduction of duty credit schemes devoted to the purchase of capital equipment.

The Swart report put forward a range of beneficial proposals such as increases in payroll deductions and state assistance for training, interest rate subsidies for technological upgrading. A critical role for business support assistance and improved manufacturing technology and retail interfacing.

In line, this report recommended that government assistance be tied to job creation, plans for improved competitiveness or determined social indicators.

Adult literacy has increased by 15% since 1980, according to the National Education Profile. Wits University, KwaZulu, Durban University, Cape Town and Wits University were the most prominent institutions in terms of educational qualifications.

Altman teaches economics at Wits University.
The Trade and Industry minister, Trevor Manuel, knows he is attempting the impossible as he tries to sort out the vexing problem of removing trade barriers from the rag trade, while protecting thousands of jobs.

He is stuck in a scrum with heavyweights from the World Trade Organisation, the textile manufacturers, the clothing manufacturers, the clothing retailers, exporters, the cotton farmers and wool growers, and the unions all piling into the fray. His job is made no easier when he is caught in the middle of punchups between the combatants.

Responding to criticism of his handling of the problems, Manuel said in an interview this week "inevitably whoever is the minister of trade and industry will take the rap. There are issues for which no one wants to take responsibility." But he is adamant that he will press on in sorting out the mess caused by years of protectionist policies put in place to beat off a hostile world.

Manuel said he was also heir to a disentanglement policy put in place by Derek Keys, former finance minister.

"Derek Keys, in his wisdom, initiated a piecemeal approach to look at the industry in its entirety. It was the logical thing to do, but it is also an extremely difficult path to take."

There were continual trade-offs and spin-offs in decision making, Manuel said.

For example, no more than 40 percent of textiles manufactured in South Africa went into locally manufactured clothing, but the barriers for entry to the clothing industry were much lower than for the textile industry.

In other words, jobs could be created far more cheaply and easily in clothing, particularly as many manufacturers undertold the design and cutting while contracting out the make-up to small operators. Manuel said the position was further complicated by the clothing retail industry, which was dominated by four or five big chains, and which wanted to import clothing at reduced tariffs.

"If we drop tariffs on textiles rapidly, clothing manufacturers would smile — but we could lose as many as 40 000 jobs."

"If we drop tariffs on clothing, retailers would smile — but we would probably lose 40 000 jobs."

The complexity was made worse by the many different tariffs. Apart from ad valorem duties there were also specific duties on different products.

In terms of the offer to the Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations, the duties on textiles had to come down to 22.5 percent and to 45 percent on clothing. Both were currently way above 100 percent.

Manuel said the objective was to maintain jobs while improving competitiveness. The textile industry also had to be given breathing space to invest capital in plants. The years of economic isolation had resulted in machinery falling one and even two generations behind, reducing international competitiveness.

He said the government had taken a first step in assisting the textile industry to upgrade its equipment by removing the 15 percent surcharge on capital goods in the last Budget.

The government had also assisted the clothing manufacturers by reintroducing the Duty Credit Certification scheme, which provided a rebate of duties on textiles used for clothing for export.

The DCC scheme had been adapted to make it more friendly to smaller exporters in order to encourage the creation of jobs.

"What we need to do is push through reforms in a way which will take account of the widest cross-section of interests."

Manuel said there was no doubt that there were many marginal jobs in the clothing and textile industries but he could not predict how many jobs would be lost.

He said job numbers were increasing in some areas, particularly in clothing manufacturing for niche export markets.

MODEL C schools in 'white' areas report large increases in black admissions

STAFF REPORTERS

The first generation of South African children to be provided a fully open and equal education started school in Gauteng today.

There were reports of race discrimination by some white headmasters yesterday when pupils were being registered, but this morning previously white schools checked by The Star had opened their doors for the first time to all Model C schools, some of which did admit some black pupils in the past, have been reporting a large increase in black admissions.

As thousands of South African prepared for their big day, government officials warned that strong action would be taken against any school refusing to admit pupils because of their race or for any other criteria that might be deemed discriminatory.

The warning, issued by both Gauteng and national education officials, came amid increasing reports of racism in admission policies of certain Model C schools.

Officials were not able to specify what form any action might take.

Gauteng MEC for education Mary Metcalfe's spokesman, Robinson Nkemani, said the ministry had received reports of schools refusing admission to black children on the grounds that they were full, and later accepting applications from white children.

"Several schools around Johannesburg are being investigated and if the allegations are confirmed, the ministry will definitely act against such schools. The parent also has the right to take legal action against the school as this kind of action is unconstitutional," he said.

Ramatste said a "substantial number" of the more than 500 calls received by the ministry's central admissions office yesterday had related to racist

Ensign suffers from loss of sales

CAPE-based clothing manufacturer Ensign hoped to break even in the current financial year to end-December, chairman and MD Ronald Roy said in the company's annual report.

Roy said Ensign's forward order book had shown some improvement and the current upturn in the economy was helping the company increase output, which in turn would increase contributions towards overhead costs.

Ensign manufactures uniforms, overalls, workwear, leisure wear and protective clothing under the Samson International, Macbean and Samson labels.

However, Roy said the company still had some low value contracts to be delivered during the next few months and he did not expect a return to profitability during the first half of the year.

The company reported an attributable loss of R23.8m for the year to December compared with a loss of R214,000 the year before, while turnover slipped 2% to R293.8m.

Roy said it was disappointing that the company could not reverse the downward trend during the review period.

He noted that the drop in turnover was a result of its inability to fully recover sales from alternative markets after a significant reduction in business from its traditional market, the public sector.

Intense competition resulted in pressure on margins and the sharp drop in output resulted in the company's inability to fully recover overheads, despite its efforts to reduce costs.

Roy said downsizing and retrenchments in the previous year had demoralised staff, while the unexpected holidays declared at election time and "minor" incidents of labour unrest had adversely affected productivity.
Labour is clothing industry’s key concern

Strikes, intimidation, low productivity, new labour legislation — these are just some of the issues raised by manufacturers.

By Charlotte Mathews
Investment Editor

Conditions in the clothing industry remain difficult and although some companies are expecting an improvement in 1995, others are still battling to overcome the problems that arose in previous years.

According to chairmen of three listed clothing groups which released annual reports this week, labour and productivity are still areas of considerable concern.

Allwear chairman Renier van Rooyen, whose group specialises in schoolwear, said unresolved labour issues may produce similar strike actions in 1995 to those seen last year.

"The still relatively high unemployment levels and the slow delivery of RDP projects could lead to disillusionment, and higher crime levels which, if not dealt with effectively, could erode the confidence of the much-needed investors, with obvious implications," he said.

Casualwear manufacturer Sterng Clothing chairman Fred Haslett said the successful election had given the majority of the population a false expectation of immediate change for the better.

He said it appeared as if the authorities were intent on having labour legislation which would compare favourably with that of most advanced countries.

"Wildcat strikes, intimidation and additional public holidays are very costly and can make international competitiveness extremely difficult and hinder economic recovery," he said.

Ensang Clothing chairman Ronald Roy reported that the group’s productivity suffered from the demoralising effects on employees of downsizing and retrenchments that occurred in 1993, and the election, sporadic go-slows and stoppages.

Ensang is taking steps to improve efficiency on the factory floor, where recent changes to strengthen management are starting to show results. But a high level of absenteeism continues to be a worrying factor.

All three companies passed their dividends for 1994.

Ensang and Sterling reported disappointing results in the year to December. Ensang increased its attributable loss before extraordinary items to R1.9 million from R906 000 and Sterling’s after-tax earnings dropped to R296 000 from R354 000. Both have taken or are taking remedial action.

Allwear, however, grew its net profit by 79 percent to R5 million on an 11.4 percent rise in turnover.

The forecast for pupil enrolment between 1995 and 2001 indicates a growth of 45 percent or nearly five million pupils and there has been a growing trend in black schools towards an identifiable uniform. Allwear has also successfully grown its exports.

Van Rooyen forecast better results for Allwear in 1995 and if the profitability of the company is maintained, dividend payments should resume.

Sterling also expects to resume dividend payments as soon as the benefit of new strategies are realised, but shareholders are asked to exercise patience.

Ensang expects to break even by the end of 1995 because it still has some low-value contracts to deliver. It hopes to resume dividend payments in 1996.
Fate of industries known very soon

NICOLA JENVEY

DURBAN — Government's long-awaited decision on the fate of the SA textile and clothing industries would be announced within a month, Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel said at the weekend.

Addressing a gathering of the city's prominent businessmen, Manuel said a report had been presented to him last week, which he had found "unsatisfactory and I rejected it".

The revised edition would be available "very soon, no more than a month".

Manuel said imminent changes to SA's antitrust legislation would boost competitive levels between small and large firms and ensure internationally favourable prices.

He was presently working on a Bill for presentation before Cabinet in June, although current legislation had already been used to break cartels within the cement and steel industries and help a small-scale cinema company compete against Ster-Kinekor.

The local economy had to be "particularly watchful against smugness", as misleading the present cyclical upturn would be disastrous.

The key challenge is placing this economy on a growth path which can ride out cyclical ebb and flow.

"This demands that we take stock of the implications of this country's rapid re-integration into the world economy," the minister said.

He said the role of government in meeting this challenge was far less than that of business.
Clothing boss slams state’s ‘shotgun approach’

BY ROY CORAYNE

Pretoria Business Editor

The president of the South African Clothing Federation, Ahmed-Sadek Vahed, yesterday appealed to the government to replace “shotgun policies” for promoting industrial growth with the scientific selection and promotion of specific industries.

Opening Southclo’s first international clothing exhibition at Midrand, Vahed said that on merit and track record, the clothing industry should be at the top of the list.

“Unfortunately, labour-intensive industries are unable to match the financial and lobbying power of big, capital-intensive industries — hence the apparent reluctance of our government to govern,” he said.

Vahed said Southclo members could contribute more to achieving South Africa’s RDP objectives than many of the projects of state, which required massive state funding.

Southclo members — from South Africa, Mauritius, Zimbabwe and Madagascar — had for the first time combined their resources in the field of clothing manufacture to stage a joint exhibition of their products.

Visitors to the exhibition would see a “humble germ” giving meaning to the notion of a constellation of Southern African states.

Vahed said the Southclo region had a combined population of 110 million people — or 1.8 percent of the world population of 6 billion, of which only 25 percent were in the middle to higher-income group.

But the aggregate clothing output of these countries of about $3.3 billion a year represented only 1.5 percent of the world’s clothing output of $220 billion.

World trade in clothing was estimated at $140 billion a year, of which 60 percent originated in developing countries.

Southern Africa’s total clothing exports of $1.1 billion represented a modest 0.8 percent of this figure.

However, southern Africa had the labour and know-how to become a true world player in clothing. This would be an effective and speedy avenue for creating jobs.

To achieve this goal, the region had to:

- Increase the efficiency of the labour force and of management.
- Obtain raw materials at international prices.
- Invest in new technology.
- Become true marketers, offering customers and potential customers what they wanted at competitive prices.
Manuel rejects textile and clothing report

BY MORGAN NABU

The minister of trade and industry, Trevor Manuel, has rejected as "inadequate" the latest policy document on restructuring the clothing and textile industries.

Speaking in Durban at the weekend, the minister said he had received a report on clothing and textiles which included input on "tariffs and import duties. "But I didn't like it."

The clothing sector has called for a reduction in restrictive tariffs and import duties which have benefited the textile industry in the past three years.

They have been at loggerheads with the textile conglomerates and the SA clothing and textile workers' union who feel that a sudden reduction of tariffs and duties would lead to loss of jobs.

Manuel has remained steadfast despite intense lobbying from both sides and has declared his support for a compromise which will benefit both industries.

At the weekend forum, the minister promised the clothing and textile industries a new report with concrete proposals within a month.

He did not divulge his reasons for rejecting the initial report but said further "number-crunching" was taking place in preparation of the new report.

Moving to other issues he warned business to be cautious "because the South African economy has been highly and overly protected by past governmental ineptitude."

He said it was imperative that SA increased its share of manufactured exports. "Competitiveness was the key factor."

"Our firms must concentrate on reducing prices, getting smarter methodology and better training for management and workers alike."

"Unless we can compete in both foreign and domestic markets we will see more and more of our firms collapse."

Other key factors to be considered, Manuel said, were the accessing of niche markets across the world, support programmes to help small and medium businesses flourish and an intense focus on manufacturing, since its base in South Africa was much too narrow.

The government would do its best to secure best access for local goods and services, he said.
German clothing expert offers help

Most German children choose their careers at the age of 14 or 15 and start vocational training while still at school, says Marthes Temme, secretary-general of the German Clothing Association.

At a meeting of clothing and textile manufacturers in Sea Point yesterday, she offered to help her South African counterparts set up a similar system which, she said, would result in higher skills and improved productivity.

Temme said the German clothing industry had shrunk by a third in the past five years because manufacturers were relocating to countries where labour was cheaper. The industry was expected to shrink by another third by the turn of the century, she said.

However, Temme added, German manufacturers with the necessary skills had continued to work in management and supervisory positions in factories outside their home country.

Bernard Richards, the chairman of the South African Clothing Manufacturers' Federation, said he did not expect local manufacturers to move to countries where labour was cheaper.

South African retailers expected quick service and manufacturers needed to be near them to supply this.

"Our customers and infrastructure are here," he said.

But, said Richards, it was possible that factories making mass-produced garments—such as T-shirts, which were not produced in South Africa as it was not economic to do so—might be opened in neighbouring countries, such as Mozambique, where wages were lower.
Squabbling sectors plan joint training

By Audrey D'Angelo

South Africa's textile and clothing industries — still squabbling over tariff protection — held their first combined conference to discuss training yesterday.

Mervyn King, the president of the South African Textile Manufacturers' Federation, said the development of a joint human resources strategy would improve quality and productivity and make exports more competitive.

Bernard Richards, the president of the Clothing Manufacturers' Federation, said the industries had to "make up for lost time" after failing to keep up with international developments during the apartheid era.

Richards said developing the clothing industry was a quick way to create jobs. But, he added, the efficiency of workers and management would have to increase.

The two industries were moving out of conflict, he said, and were now working together with the South African Clothing and Textile Workers Union to "develop the people of our country."
Warring industries agree on training

CAPE TOWN — The Clothing Federation and the Textile Federation, which have been at loggerheads with each other over tariffs, agreed on Wednesday to formulate a joint strategy on training.

Textile Federation president Mervyn King said co-operation between the two industries was essential to enable them to become internationally competitive.

He said co-operation was needed not only in the human resources field, but along the entire production and export pipeline. Duplication of training and overlapping of resources between the clothing and textile industries had to be avoided.

King said incentives should be offered to large corporations to make their training facilities available to small- and medium-sized businesses.

Clothing Federation vice president Bernard Richards said the clothing industry offered the potential of speedy employment growth in SA, but needed to increase the efficiency of its labour and management and had to obtain materials at world-competitive prices.

Richards added that the Clothing Federation planned to invite the Textile Federation to join the proposed Clothing Export Council.
Inglotex aims for move to W Cape

BUTTERWORTH knitwear manufacturer Inglotex could move to the Western Cape because of problems with infrastructure in the Transkei.

Inglotex managing director Gavin Kay said in an interview the factory, which employs 200 people, would either close down or relocate.

Labour problems, disruptions in electricity and water supplies and difficulties with the road transport of raw materials made it impossible to continue production in Butterworth, he said.

Inglotex also has a clothing plant in East London, employing 100 people.

Mr Kay said the Butterworth factory would close next month.

Options being considered included starting up production in the Western Cape or moving the plant overseas.

The plant was ultra modern and could easily be exported.

"We have done a feasibility study for the Western Cape and it looks positive. "Labour productivity is high and the municipalities are co-operative," Mr Kay said.

Much would depend on a decision by Minister of Trade and Industry Trevor Manuel on duties on textile imports.

"We just can't compete with cheap imports," Mr Kay said.

SA loses R400m in export ‘fraud’

By ANDREW TRENCH

POLICE are investigating a huge clothing-export fraud alleged to have cost the state about R400-million and involving over 50 companies.

KwaZulu Natal Attorney-General Tim McNally confirmed this week that the Office for Serious Economic Offences had conducted investigations into three clothing groups allegedly involved in the fraud.

The companies are accused of filing false claims for cash incentives worth millions from the government for non-existent exports to Mozambique and Hong Kong.

The KwaZulu Natal-based companies are Two Way Clothing and Baywood Design, which form part of the Abhold group, Pam Clothing and Zaz Clothing, both part of the Pam group, and Group 88, which comprises some 50 companies.

The largest of the alleged frauds is believed to have been committed in the Group 88 case. Mr McNally said police investigations were continuing but “indications are that the (Group 88) fraud is in the region of R300-million”.

Rodney Brett and Dionissimos Koumoulos, identified as suspects in the Group 88 investigation, had fled the country, Mr McNally said. An industry source said Mr Brett was Group 88’s managing director and Mr Koumoulos its accountant.

In the Abhold case, two men — Osman Aboo, 52, a director of Two Way Clothing, and Junaid Khan, 25, an administrative secretary — have been charged.

Mr McNally said they were alleged to have defrauded the state of about R18-million but, with actual losses of customs duty and VAT, that figure rose to R63-million.

The Abhold companies are alleged to have defrauded the General Export Incentive Scheme by submitting false claims for exports to foreign countries. The former Structural Adjustment Programme is also alleged to have been defrauded.

The General Export Incentive Scheme allows clothing exporters to claim refunds from the government based on the value of their exports. The Structural Adjustment Programme allowed clothing manufacturers to import certain goods, such as fabric, duty-free.

Mr McNally said the state alleged that the Abhold and Pam companies had filed false claims for exports to Mozambique.

In the Group 88 case, investigators had established a “complex and extensive” fraud where export figures submitted to the government had been “grossly inflated”.

The Department of Trade and Industry said it was convinced that none of its employees was involved in the alleged irregularities.

It said its “diligent” officials had directed the Office for Serious Economic Offences to investigate cases of alleged fraud.

A National Clothing Federation spokesman said the clothing industry of 1,400 manufacturers should not be tainted by the alleged crimes.

He said the government had tightened controls on the export incentive scheme since the alleged fraud had been committed. Previously, the Department of Trade and Industry had paid out incentives without proof that payments for exports had arrived in the country.
Amrel's bottom-line profit up sixfold

BY CHARLOTTE MATHews

Furniture and clothing group Amrel, a 69 percent-held subsidiary of SA Breweries, improved bottom-line profit in the year to March sixfold in comparison with the same period in 1993, aided by better trading conditions, attention to margins and the proceeds of last year's rights offer.

Turnover grew by 12.3 percent to R1,3 billion, on which trading profit of R85,6 million was achieved. Operating margins lifted 6.5 percent against 1994's 5.3 percent. Financial director Bruce Sinclair said the group aimed for margins of 8.5 percent.

Net financial costs dropped by R5 million to R51,7 million after the injection of R155 million from a rights issue held last August, which saw interest-bearing debt on the balance sheet fall to R410,8 million (R512,4 million).

Gearing is now 129 percent from 132 percent a year previously, now just within the group's target of 130 percent and at a level it feels more comfortable with, Sinclair said.

After an easier tax charge, attributable earnings soared to R20,2 million from R3,3 million, but because of the higher number of shares in issue after the rights offer, earnings a share were up by a lesser 100 percent to 10c.
The first noticeable aspect of Da Gama’s preliminaries for financial 1994 is the 39% increase in attributable earnings to R24,6m on turnover growth of only 15%. Pre-tax income actually rose 51% but the tax bill doubled to R8,5m from R4,3m in 1993. Nonetheless, EPS rose 39% to 48,2c and a dividend of 21c (1993 15c) was declared.

The company has a strong balance sheet, with net interest earned of R2,6m for the year and liquid assets of R65,3m (1993 R22m), 29% of the total current assets. The group operates in four main markets: household (curtains and bed linen), home sewing (bolts of material) largely for the informal sector, industrial contracts (such as hospital sheets) and apparel, which includes fashion and workwear.

About R25m is earned from a chain of retail/wholesale stores which the group has operated for about two years, adding up to a total turnover of R305,7m.

CE Harry Pearce says the household and workwear sectors have shown “nice growth,” with real volumes rising well. Industrial contracts have been flat because of reduced government spending but the defence forces have awarded the group a full contract, worth about R10m, for camouflage clothing.

“Previously, we had only about a third of the contract; so it’s gratifying to have the lot now,” says Pearce.

The large cash assets are a consequence of good stock control and better margins. Working capital held in stock is down by R15m-R20m on the previous year, he says.

During the 1993 strike, management decided its best move in bad times was to conserve cash. As a result of squeezing assets, the balance sheet looks good.

Sitting on such a large cash pile, the group is on the lookout for acquisitions. Pearce doesn’t think horizontal expansion will work. “That means buying big and we don’t want serious borrowings,” he says. He stresses the group looks for value-added buys, as in the retail shops. The most likely route for Da Gama is to move down the value chain, possibly into shops supplying bed linen.

Pearce considers the group is in the upswing of its cycle. “A lot depends on the Swart report and what (Trade & Industry Minister Trevor) Manuel does about tariffs,” he says.

The share is on a p/e of 8,1 at 390c. With NAV at 490c a share, Da Gama represents good value for money.
Ragtrade pay talks pressure

WAGE negotiations affecting more than 100,000 workers in the clothing industry in South Africa's cities are under way, with the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) demanding a 15 percent increase in wages.

After the second round of negotiations, this week in Durban, clothing employers offered a 9.5 percent wage increase and an increase of 0.5 percent in provident fund contributions.

Employers have also agreed to contribute 20c per worker per week to the union's bursary fund.

Other Sactwu demands include:

- A guaranteed annual bonus of one-and-a-half week's wages, and
- The regulation of fixed contract labour.

S National negotiator Lionel October explained that with the upturn in the industry, clothing firms were taking on workers on short-term contracts of one or two months.

The union was not opposed to this, he said, "provided there's a good reason, such as an urgent export order."

"We are saying there should be consultation on this."

Sactwu is also asking for a closing of the wage gap between the Western Cape, Gauteng and Natal on one hand, and the Eastern Cape, Northern Cape and Free State on the other.

Higher profit levels, rising share prices of listed companies and better employment figures suggested that the industry was in an "upsing". "Clothing workers are demanding wage increases above the inflation rate this year, in other words real wage increases," Mr October said.
Call to end textile tariff poser

Deputy Business Editor

TEXTILE Federation president Mervyn King has called for an end to the uncertainty on textile and clothing tariffs, which he says is holding up capital spending of $1 billion by textile companies.

In a statement, Mr King said the majority of Texfed's 90 member companies intended to renew capital stock, re-train work forces and remodel businesses, but decisions were being delayed by the tariff question.

Mr King said Texfed welcomed indications that a decision would be announced "within weeks".

But Department of Trade and Industry spokesmen were tight-lipped this week on the timing of the announcement.

Reports that minister Trevor Manuel would announce the new tariffs at a conference on branding and competitiveness in Cape Town later this month were unfounded, a spokesman said.

Mr King said there would be wide public interest in the outcome of the tariff issue.

The minister's decision would reflect the extent to which economic policy-making was influenced by "heated populist rhetoric and the questionable analyses of expensive consultants."

Texfed and the Clothing Federation are locked in a bitter fight over tariffs, with clothing manufacturers calling for rapid cuts in protective duties on textiles.

Drought-hit cotton growers in Australia are trapped in a multi-million-dollar bind as they find themselves unable to deliver forward-sold cotton for a market where prices have hit an historic high, reports Sapa-AFP.

In the cotton trade it is estimated that more than 100,000 bales of grower forward sales cannot be delivered to merchants.

A commodities consultant estimated the figure could leave growers paying out about $US18 million.

Cotton prices have hit levels unseen since the American Civil War, wreaked the Southern states' cotton trade in the 1860s.

The price has zoomed off a low of 65.9 US cents a pound to a high last week of around 117.5 US cents.

If growers cannot deliver forward-sold cotton to merchants they have to pay the price difference to cancel the contract.

Australia ranks about fourth among cotton exporters in a good year, producing at the high-quality end of the market and exporting about 90 percent of the crop.

But 1995 is not a good year, and the industry expects the crop currently being picked to be around 1.5 million bales. Government economists say this is about half the capacity of the country's mainly irrigated fields.

"Highly beneficial rains were received in most of the Australian cotton growing regions in the crucial growing period in January and early February, alleviating acute shortage of irrigation water in most regions," said government economist Max Foster.

But in spite of these rains, industry experts said that persistent drought in some parts of eastern Australia had hit key producing areas in New South Wales such as the Macintyre and Gwydir river valleys and Namoi, cradle of the country's cotton growing industry.

The experts suggested that this year's problems could lead to changes in the individual fixed-price cash contract system.
Unions compromis on bargaining rights

COSATU, Nactu and Fedcal have agreed to compromise on the question of bargaining rights in order to discourage fragmentation and the proliferation of small trade unions.

This became clear in the joint position of Fedcal that was handed over to the Labour Relations Act within the National Economic Development and Labour Council (Nedlac).

Fedcal's general secretary, Sam Shilowa, said although the three federations supported a majoritarian approach, the law should seek to develop strong and viable trade unions.

Shilowa said the federations took account of three different positions in terms of levels of representivity. Unions with 50% plus representation in a particular bargaining unit should be entitled to representation in industry bargaining councils, unless a different level of representation had been negotiated and agreed to, he said.

Where a bargaining forum exists at company level covering two or more workplaces, unions with at least 30% representation should be entitled to all rights.

Where bargaining takes place at plant level, the unions with a 50% plus one majority should have sole bargaining rights. If no union has a majority, then any trade union with at least 30% membership will be entitled to all rights except for rights of representation and bargaining.

Shilowa said in the case of agricultural workers, unions with 15% representivity should be entitled to all rights except bargaining rights.

Business South Africa (BSA) was of the view that the Bill in some instances favoured majoritarianism rather than sufficient representivity. The federations have proposed the definition of "workplace" for the purpose of representation to be referred to as a "company" while in the retail sector, reference should not be made to "outlet".

BSA was concerned over the broad definition of "workplace", while in defining "bargaining units", employers are proposing the establishment of some formula to "delineate the boundaries of representation and organisational rights".

Labour has proposed the retention of closed shop and agency shop arrangements and the provision for single and multi-union closed shops which should be democratic through the holding of ballots.

BSA proposes that the Bill give full effect to freedom of association and to disassociate by "permitting individual employees to refrain from becoming party to any form of union security arrangement".

Labour's other concerns around the draft Bill related to the full protection of the right to strike, the use of scab labour and the definition of essential services. Shilowa said the agricultural sector should not be deemed to be an essential service.

Clothing employers' offer 'problematic'

CLOTHING employers tabled their final mandated position of 10% during the second round of wage negotiations with the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactw) last week.

Sactw's national clothing negotiator, Lionel October said negotiations could be problematic as workers were demanding a real wage increase above inflation.

Employer spokesman Johan Baard said the offer of 10% on package and 10.25% in the lower paying areas was within the national mandated position.

Employers had requested the union to present its final position to ascertain how far apart the parties were.

The union is demanding a 15% increase, an annual bonus of a week's wages, an increase in employer contributions to the industry provident fund of 6% this year and 5% next year, and regulation of fixed contract labour. It also wants a closing of the wage gap between workers in the Free State, Northern Cape and Eastern Cape and those in the Western Cape, KwaZulu-Natal and Gauteng.

Warning to conclude wage negotiations

THE Hospital Personnel Trade Union of SA (Hopersa) said it would do everything possible to ensure public sector wage negotiations were concluded this week to avoid "widespread labour unrest".

Negotiations are due to resume this week in Cape Town. Hopersa's national collective bargaining secretary Nic Kruger blamed delays on government negotiators not being properly mandated.

Kruger called on government to bargain in good faith as negotiations, which started in August last year, were "costing the taxpayer enormous amounts of money".

Hopersa would insist on a written guarantee that existing pension benefits would remain intact and any deficits in funds would be made good within three years.

Hopersa would also fight for the implementation date of increases to be backdated to April 1, not on July 1 as proposed by government.
THE SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) has applied for an urgent interdict against Garlicks in Cape Town and is demanding that the company pay out severance packages to retrenched workers instead of the company's pension fund. More than 100 workers from Garlicks' Cavendish store in Cape Town were retrenched in April. The company obtained permission from the Commission for Inland Revenue and registrar of pension funds to use monies available from the company pension fund to pay out workers. However, Sactwu spokesman Richard Kwie said it was unfair to use the workers' own monies to pay out the severance packages. Company spokesman Gary Spreckley said because of the company's financial position it had no option but to use the funds from the pension fund.

Turnover: Frame, Da Gama, Romatex and Unispin, while the top three in clothing are Scandalli, unlisted AM Moolia and Rex Trueform.

Romatex and Rex Trueform have proved to be the market leaders in terms of exports. Both are relatively small compared with the giants in their industries, Frame and Scandalli.

Romatex CEO Mike Hanksen told a recent analysts' society presentation that his group would not be affected by the new tariff dispensation because the company concentrated on niche markets and had a strong exporting arm.

A further benefit for the group was its strong presence in the contract markets, which was less cyclical than the consumer market.

Until December Romatex included other divisions, among them bulk storage and industrial concerns. Management restructured the group, listing the industrial concerns under Island View Holdings. At the time chairman Jack Crutchley expressed optimism about the future despite the uncertainty over the tariff phase-down period.

In the clothing industry Rex Trueform has been proven to be the market leader in the export market. Chairman Stewart Shub said the uncertainty about export incentives had affected exports.

However, the uncertainty has been removed. Manuel has announced a three-year extension of the duty credit certificate scheme and the general expert incentive scheme.

These are two major spurs for clothing exporters.

Da Gama maintained a strong surge in the export market, aided by the weaker rand.

For Manuel these are good examples of international competitiveness and proof that SA companies can cope, but the question to which he must provide an answer is the phase-down period.

Industry sources said eight years in which to reduce tariff protection would still be palatable, but recently there had been concern that government would opt for a period of from four to six years.

A joint decision by clothing, labour and the textile industry in the Swart panel to a 10-year phase-down on tariffs, two years less than GATT requirements, was tabled a year ago.

The clothing industry subsequently made alternative proposals after Manuel indicated that government did not have the financial resources to supply the R4.5bn suggested by the Swart panel to make the industries competitive.

Clothing's proposals suggest a one-to-seven-year phase-down on textiles, while it retains the 10-year suggestion of the Swart panel for the clothing industry. It says the clothing industry should have the opportunity to import its fabrics, yarn and fibre duty-free.

Subsequently, the Monitor report on SA's competitiveness had found that the clothing industry had elements of international competitiveness. This has been disputed by Textile Federation president Mervyn King, who said the clothing industry already had duty-free access to textiles for re-export under the Customs and Excise Act.

He noted that clothing exports have been declining with no discernible surge in employment, while the clothing industry indicated it would not be internationally competitive without export incentive measures.

The textile industry provides 360 000 jobs directly and indirectly, and the clothing industry 90 000 jobs.

The SA Clothing and Allied Workers' Union has supported the textile industry's call to government to implement the Swart report's 10-year phase-down period. Manuel has promised a decision this month, and the industries believe it may be announced next week.
Clothing workers offered 13 pc

Business Editor

MORE than 100 000 clothing workers all over the country have been asked to approve a 13 percent rise in wages and fringe benefits.

The offer, hammered out by representatives of the South African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) and the National Clothing Federation in Durban on Tuesday, is being discussed in clothing factories today.

Workers in the Free State, the Northern Cape and the Eastern Cape are to be offered an extra 0.5 percent in a bid to narrow inequalities between the regions.

The Durban agreement follows five unsuccessful meetings between the union and the employers.

Last week thousands of clothing workers demonstrated in Cape Town and Durban in support of their demands.

Employers were offering a wage increase of 11 percent with a one percent increase in bonuses and provident fund contributions. The union was holding out for a 15 percent package, with a 12 percent wage increase and a three percent rise in bonuses and provident fund contributions.

Cape Clothing Manufacturers' Association president Johann Baard said he was "hopeful" the Durban deal would be ratified by employers and workers.

But Sactwu national negotiator Lionel October said it would be "touch and go" in the factories.

Employers and union members are to report back to their representatives by Monday. The new wage rates are due to come into effect next month.
Textile deal

TRADE and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel hinted on Friday that tariffs for textiles from Zimbabwe could be reduced soon after he announces his restructuring proposals for the local textile industry.

The tariffs were more than doubled in 1997 after pressure from SA's textile manufacturers, and was largely responsible for the closure of many textile firms in Zimbabwe.
Allwear bullish on growth

BY FRANCOES BOTHA

Clothing manufacturer Allwear is expecting strong growth in turnover and earnings per share during its current financial year.

Chairman Reiner van Rocyen said at the company's annual general meeting in Cape Town that turnover was expected to increase by 30 to 35 percent this year. "Turnover is already 50 percent higher for the first four months of this year," he said.

Earnings per share growth before tax was expected to be 68 percent. This would be reduced to about 35 percent after tax, Van Rooyen added.

Allwear expects key growth to come from school uniforms as the number of children attending school increases from 8.9 million at the beginning of this year to 12.9 million in 2004.
Allwear investors in line for dividend

JOHN VIJJOEN
Business Staff

BUOYANT school uniform and menswear manufacturer Allwear should reward patient shareholders with a dividend at the end of this year, if its strong performance over the first four months of 1995 is anything to go by.

Allwear had concentrated on rebuilding and improving its asset base over the past four years, chairman Renier van Rooyen told the AGM in Cape Town yesterday.

"We are not 100 percent sure, but if business keeps on as it has for the first four months, we will definitely consider a dividend at the end of the year.

Turnover rose by 50 percent in the first third of the year, purely on the strength of increased sales in distinctive school uniforms, MD Josie Jordan said.

Cash flow had improved to the extent that borrowings were zero at the end of April and the company had money on call. It was possible that earnings per share this year could be 53c, up on 35c for the year ended December and 20c in 1993.

The company improved its bottom line by 79 percent to R5 million last year, after a 11.4 percent increase in turnover to R84.4 million.

Allwear, which has about 12 percent of the South African school market through 1,256 retailers in terms of sales, expects to gain a healthy share of the business of clothing the growing number of school goers.

The nine million pupils in school in January this year would be 13.6 million by 2004, Mr Jordan said.

A culture of learning was being fostered in black schools previously torn by unrest and disruption, particularly in Gauteng.

More and more parents wanted their schools to have a unique, distinctive uniform - not simply the standard black dresses and trousers with white shirts, he said.

The age when black pupils dropped out of school was also likely to improve, also adding to growth in the market. In all, the market should grow by about 46 percent in real terms in the next decade.

The company was now importing about half of the fabric it used and had enjoyed great success in finding cheap sources of quality material overseas, Mr Jordan said.

Quality was so good that the rate of goods returned due to poor quality had dropped 75 percent.

With fabrics accounting for 70 percent of total production costs, the benefits of reducing tariffs were clear, he said. Allwear was as internationally competitive as any manufacturer in the Far East.

Exports were likely to be pegged at 20 percent of sales due to the rapid growth of the domestic market, Mr Van Rooyen said.

Investment company Coro nation Holdings has taken a 15 percent share in Allwear, becoming the second largest shareholder.

Parent company Hicor has dropped its stake from 62 percent to 49 percent.
Sactwu suspends talks

FOLLOWING in the footsteps of the Chemical Workers Industrial Union, the SA Clothing and Textile Workers Union (Sactwu) has suspended plant-level talks in several sectors where centralised bargaining forums do not exist.

In the textile industry the union has, over the past two years, held discussions with employers on the formation of a national industry forum to represent the industry in macroeconomic negotiations and to bargain collectively on "macro-industrial issues common to the industry."

These would include training, pension and provident fund, health care and industrywide exemptions from relevant legislation and any other matter agreed to by the parties.

Within this framework, nine sectoral bargaining forums were identified where wages and other substantive conditions of employ
Waiting for Manuel

With Trade & Industry Minister Trevor Manuel expected to announce a new long-term plan for the textile and clothing industries within a week, the clothing sector is still lobbying furiously for a speedy reduction of textile tariffs.

The announcement could either be the culmination of or just another chapter in a saga in which the two sectors have fought running battles over protective tariffs.

Last week, Manuel indicated to delegates at a Cape Town seminar that the announcement could be expected by the end of the month.

The clothing industry is perturbed that higher "interim" textile tariffs are being used as a basis from which textile companies are asking for more time to reform.

The textile lobby hopes for a 10-year tariff phase-down period but the clothing sector feels that a differentiated, one- to three-year period would be sufficient for its textile fibres, yarn and fabric inputs.

Looking at some recent textile industry financial results, it is no wonder the sector is fighting so hard to retain its position. Remates, in the six months to end-March, reported a 100% jump in attributable profit. Frame Group quadrupled interim December earnings to R26m. Da Gama lifted earnings 56% in the year to end-September, and Nimma & Lester trebled earnings.

Clothing Federation executive director Henrie van Zyl says he is relieved that textile companies such as David Whitehead and Claus Daun's company DeNim prove the textile industry does not need a decade to become globally competitive.

He adds the federation has been approached by the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Trade & Industry to explain its views on the harmful economic effects of tariff protection. "I only hope it will not be too late."
Crisis talks in rag trade today

A CRISIS meeting is to be held at a Bellville hotel today to stave off a strike in the clothing industry, which employs nearly 50,000 people in the Western Cape.

National negotiator for the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union, Mr Lionel October, said yesterday a formal dispute had been declared two weeks ago, and the union was now legally entitled to ballot its members on a strike.

Dispute meetings were held last week in the various regions.

In terms of the Industrial Council regulations, there need not be a 30-day cooling off period between a ballot and a strike. The union may strike immediately.

Mr October said the employers' offers were between 11% and 11.25%, but the union wants 15%.

"Our members expect to get at least a real increase this year instead of just something that compensates for inflation. Our industry has suffered through a recession during which there were many retrenchments, but now the economy has improved."

'Last-ditch' talks

Labour Reporter

WAGE negotiations described as "last-ditch" talks between the Clothing National Bargaining Forum and the South African Clothing and Textile Workers Union have resumed after breaking off at 2am today.

The union's national negotiator Lionel October said that the employers had shifted their offer from 11 percent to 12 percent but the union was holding out for 15 percent.

The 15 percent included two percent provident fund and guaranteed annual bonus components.

The union represents over 100,000 clothing industry workers throughout the country.

A dispute was declared between the union and various regional clothing and industrial workers and councils on May 15.

Mr October said the union had arranged for urgent annual general meetings to be held throughout the country later this week for workers to decide whether to revert to industrial action.

"We are still talking but it's become very much touch and go," said Mr October.
Small manufacturers 'mislay' some workers

BY FRANCOISE BOTHA  STAFF WRITER

Small clothing businesses are mushrooming in the Western Cape without hiring many new workers, according to industrial council figures.

Employment figures for small, medium and micro-enterprises in the clothing industry point towards firms evading industrial council levies by concealing the number of employees or by laying off workers.

Figures released for the three months to end-April show the firms which were not parties to the main and national division agreements, typically, small businesses, are on the increase. But the numbers they employ have remained virtually unchanged over the past year.

The number of firms in this category has increased steadily as a percentage of the total from 59 percent in 1993 to 64 percent by April this year.

The number of employees has, however, remained constant in percentage terms over the same period, but reflects a decrease from 25 percent to 23 percent of the total labour pool over the past year.

For an industry that employs about 50,000 workers in the Western Cape to show small businesses have increased their workforce by only 27 workers over the past year indicates many workers are unaccounted for.

A spokesman for the Independent Garment Manufacturers' Association said, "Many small firms employ more people than the industrial council is aware of because they make substantial use of casual and contract workers that they do not register with the council."

Chris Darroll, executive director of the Sunnyside Group which represents small employers, said, "If the small businesses are growing outside of the formal structures it tells me that the industrial council is an inappropriate structure for the informal sector."

A manufacturer who did not wish to be named said she had retrenched 20 of her 25 staff to operate within the industrial council exemption which applies to employers of six workers or less. "If you take the staff that we had, the levy would have run into thousands of rands every month and because we were working on very tight margins, we couldn't afford to pay it," she said.
Seams come apart on clothing plan

Yuri Thumbran

TRADE and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel's plan to link export assistance for clothing and textiles to productivity and training has come unravelled.

The plan was that exporting companies would qualify for exemption from import duties through the duty credit certificate scheme only if they met training and productivity criteria monitored by the National Productivity Institute.

However, the Clothing Federation (Clofed) and the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) disagreed over implementation of training measures. The Textile Federation (Texted) joined the fray, complaining about the lack of progress at the institute.

In a letter to Sactwu, Clofed executive director Henne van Zyl said Trade and Industry's proposal was that a maximum of 10% of scheme benefits be spent on training until target expenditure of 4% of wages was achieved. However, Clofed wanted a maximum of 5% spent on training until target expenditure was achieved.

Van Zyl said reducing the maximum to 5% would give flexibility to companies to which marketing and technology would be a more appropriate strategy. The institute had a vital role to play in identifying the most appropriate strategies for individual companies, and these plans had to be lodged with the department.

"There is growing concern that instruments created to promote exports and international competitiveness are being turned into instruments to promote training," he said.

Texted executive director Brian Brink expressed concern that with the export year already in its second month, the institute had not yet finalised guidelines. "Companies could go out of their way to meet the targets, yet at the end of the period the NPI could still fade against them."

Institute consulting services head Jan-Henk Boer said scheme beneficiaries should, with the institute's help, formalise productivity plans for 1996/97 showing status of key productivity performance indicators and improvement targets. Later accredited management consultants would help with productivity plans.

The extent of spending on training, in cases where the target figure of 4% of the wage bill could not be met, was still being negotiated between Sactwu and Clofed. If consensus could not be reached, government would have to decide.
Two marches disrupt Durban

DT. 11/6/95

DURBAN: Traffic was disrupted and main streets in the centre of Durban were blocked by two separate marches heading for the city hall yesterday.

Several hundred kwaZulu/Natal college students converged on the city hall to protest against bursary structures.

Later about 400 members of the South African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union marched to the city hall to demand a 15% pay rise.
Clothing workers march for increase

THOUSANDS of clothing workers marched in Cape Town and Durban yesterday in support of demands for a 15% increase in their total wage package.

Sapa reports Labour Minister Tito Mboweni, after accepting a memorandum from the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) outside Parliament in Cape Town, assured thousands of protesting workers his ministry fully supported the drive towards a new labour relations Act.

The marches were in response to a failure by the parties involved to reach agreement on wages at the last national dispute meeting held this week.

Sactwu negotiator Lionel October said employers had offered a 12% increase on the total package. He said shop steward council meetings would be held in the regions over the next few days to decide on whether to embark on a national strike.

In the cotton textile industry, meanwhile, national negotiations were continuing with the last scheduled meeting due to take place on June 5. The union is demanding R45 across the board per week and employers have offered R27.

Earlier in Durban, traffic was disrupted and main streets in the centre of Durban were blocked by several hundred KwaZulu/Natal college students who were marching to the city hall to protest against bursary structures.

A year ago the FM noted that Allwear was a recovery stock in a shaky clothing sector. Happily, the share has met expectations, gaining 192% over the year.

Market capitalisation is better than three times higher.

More important, profitability and balance sheet trends continue to strengthen after 1993’s turnaround. Interest payments are down more than R1m (to R1.9m), as Allwear returns to its traditional cash generating ability. Cash generated by operations increased from R3m to R7.2m.

Gearing is high, but a lot of debt is seasonal.

Better performance translated to bottom-line growth of 74%, though shareholders are again denied a dividend. In the circumstances, that’s probably prudent. About the only risk Allwear seems exposed to as it extends its strong recovery is an inadequate capital base.

Chaiman Remer van Rooyen reasons that part of the return to a culture of learning, teaching and discipline in our schools includes school uniforms.

He says the trend in traditional black schools is increasingly towards an identifiable uniform, in both urban and rural areas.

Potential in this area seems vast. With total enrolment expected to rise by 45% (5.2m pupils) by 2004, demand should be great.

The share has been reated, but still trades at a discount to the sector. The share price of 190c is a small premium to NAV. Allwear is putting capital into machines and new technology to meet expected demand.

Investors could still find considerable value in the share, even though 1994’s strong results and share price appreciation are unlikely to be repeated.
New talks on pay next week

(184) ARG 3/6/95

ALIDE DASNOIS, Business Editor

THE STALEMATE in the clothing industry wage negotiations was broken yesterday, with unions and employers agreeing to meet again next Tuesday.

Thousands of clothing workers demonstrated in Cape Town and Durban this week after the South African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) and the Cape Clothing Manufacturers' Association failed to reach an agreement at their fifth meeting last Tuesday.

The employers have been offering a 12 percent package, with a wage increase of 11 percent and an increase of one percent in bonuses and provident fund contributions.

The union has been holding out for a 15 percent package, with a wage increase of 12 percent.

Sactwu national negotiator Lionel October told Weekend Argus that union members felt strongly that clothing manufacturers could afford inflation-beating pay increases this year.

"The feeling among members is that this year the industry is making profits and can afford to pay for a real improvement in workers' standards of living."

He said wage increases in the clothing industry had not beaten inflation for three years.

Clothing Manufacturers' Association director Peter Cragg did not want to comment ahead of Tuesday's meeting, saying only that the Association could "see some hope of a settlement."

The decision to meet again came after a plenary session of the Association on Thursday night.

The union had called a meeting of its national co-ordinating committee for next Tuesday in Cape Town to decide whether to ballot members about a strike.

The wage negotiations, due to be completed by July 1, affect more than 100,000 clothing workers, about 48,000 of them in the Western Cape.
Foreign clothes buyers eyeing SA as a new source

By Derek Tomney

South African clothing manufacturers are about to become major exporters.

Owing to the virtual absence of any American, Canadian and European import quotas on southern African-made clothing, foreign buyers in these countries as well as overseas manufacturers are seeing this country as an important new source of garments.

One of these buyers is Chris Wynne-Potts, who arrived in South Africa from Sri Lanka to set up an agency for Lunnmark International. It is 100 percent owned by the Hudson Bay Company, Canada's largest retailer, with a turnover of $6 billion (R21 billion) a year.

Lunnmark did not only buy for Hudson Bay, said Wynne-Potts. It represented about 200 other companies and included major retailers such as America's K-Mart, JC Penney, Macy's and distributors such as Jockey.

To meet the needs of its client, Lunnmark has offices in 14 Asian countries as well as one in Mauritius.

Wynne-Potts said he expected to place orders in South Africa for clothing worth between $2 million and $3 million (R7.3 million and R10.9 million) by the end of this year and to at least double these figures by the end of next year.

Foreign buyers are impressed by the country's communications, its infrastructure and the sophistication of much of the clothing manufacturing sector.

The existence of a local fabric manufacturing sector was also an advantage, as was the ability of local firms to make quick turnarounds. A non-economic factor in South Africa's favour was that foreign buyers felt more secure visiting clothing factories here than in most South American countries and several Asian countries.

He said he had been calling for prices from local manufacturers and some had been very good. Some had been mixed and some manufacturers had admitted that quoting for export was something new to them and had asked for advice.

South African manufacturers wanting to export need not fear being landed with orders for which they lacked the capacity to complete. While some buyers, such as K-Mart, could place an order for one million shirts, there were specialty retailers looking for small quantities of up-market well-made quality garments.

The Singapore-based, leading group, which already has a factory in Swaziland, was opening a large plant in Newcastle. Clothing manufacturers in Mauritius were considering opening factories here because quotas were beginning to restrict Mauritian exports and labour costs were rising.

He said in terms of the World Trade Agreement, America was committed to removing tariffs within the next 12 years. This meant that South Africa had a 12-year breathing space in which to establish itself.
Clothing industry could soon dress the world

BY DEREK TOMMEE

South African clothing manufacturers are about to become major exporters.

Owing to the virtual absence of any American, Canadian and European import quotas on southern African-made clothing, foreign buyers in these countries as well as overseas manufacturers are seeing this country as an important source of garments.

One of these buyers is Chris Wynne-Potts who has recently arrived in South Africa from Sri Lanka to set up an agency for Lumark International. It is 100% owned by the Hudson Bay Company, Canada’s largest retailer with an annual turnover of $6-billion.

But Lumark doesn’t buy just for Hudson Bay, says Wynne-Potts. It represents another 200 or so companies as well including major retailers such as the US’s KMart, JC Penny, Macys and distributors such as Jockey. To meet the needs of its clients, Lumark has offices in 14 Asian countries and also one in Mauritius.

Wynne-Potts said he expected to place orders here for between $2-million and $3-million by the end of this year and to at least double that by the end of next year.

However, the absence of quotas is not the only feather in South Africa’s cap. Foreign buyers are impressed by the country’s communications, by its infrastructure and by the sophistication of much of the clothing sector.

The existence of a local fabric manufacturing sector was also a plus point, as was the ability of local firms to make quick turn-rounds.

And a non-economic factor in South Africa’s favour was that foreign investors felt much more secure visiting clothing factories here than in most South American countries and several Asian countries.
Pay deal for clothing workers

The SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union and clothing employers agreed yesterday to a 13% increase for workers on their total package year on year.

The agreement, which covers nearly 100,000 workers countrywide, has yet to be ratified by both parties. It amounts to a 12.75% increase calculated on an annual basis, and provides for a 0.5% premium above 12.75% for the Eastern Cape, Free State and Northern Cape region to help close the wage gap.

Sactwu spokesman Elias Banda said the union had belived real wage increases should be achieved because inflation had eroded the purchasing power of workers.

"This year we are now in the arena of having achieved real wage increases."

It was agreed total labour costs would be negotiated at national level with the regional industrial councils being left to structure how the total package would be apportioned between wages, annual bonuses and provident fund contributions.

Clothing employer spokesman Johan Baard said regional talks would be held to finalise agreements which took into account regional differences.

Baard said the clothing industry had an effective three-tier bargaining structure where wages were negotiated at national level; regional issues were discussed within regional industrial councils, and issues such as productivity, retrenchment and discipline and grievance at plant level.

Such an arrangement showed that "centralised bargaining need not be inflexible, unimaginative and bureaucratic. Parties could model the structure to service their interests".

† Figures adjusted to include 50% shares in subsidiaries previously accounted for as associates on an equity basis.

Restructuring costs and disruptions during the election period did not stop accessibility and trimmings manufacturer SA Bias Industries from profit growth in 1994.

Margins improved (R10.1m, from 1993’s R9.5m) and operating income was 19% up, at R21.7m (1993 R18.2m).

Restructuring has held back profits for some time. Last year was the fourth in a row in which SA Bias passed off extensive rationalising as an extraordinary item.

Moreover, for a group which dominates the trimmings market, SA Bias must feel restructuring is seriously threatening its control of management. Extraordinary items have included restraint of trade payments for the past three years.

The clothing industry’s uncertain future has persuaded SA Bias to reduce its reliance on the clothing and footwear sectors. Chairman Christopher Seabrooke says the group is developing its industrial division, which makes components and accessories for other industries. Currently, more than 40% of turnover is outside the local clothing and footwear industries.

Manufactured goods exports are “significant” and grew rapidly last year. Seabrooke expects higher export profits in 1995.

Barbour Penvalle Threads and offshore company International Trimmings — both 50% owned and previously equity-accounted as associates — have been consolidated. The motivations for this are a probable acquisition of a 5% shareholding in the former and the appointment of an SA Bias director as MD of the latter. Consolidation colours the income statement and 10-year review, adjusting figures for all the years that SA Bias held an interest in each, but does nothing for the bottom line.

MD Phillip Coutts-Trotter does not expect further major restructuring of operating divisions. He predicts capital expenditure for 1995 of R11m plus.

Given a 20% interim drop in EPS, the year-end 8.5% rise, to 35.9c (1993 33c), is significant. But SA Bias has not shown an impressive ability to grow dividends. These remain 1c, 1c up since 1992.

Rationalising has certainly left SA Bias leaner, but not necessarily meaner. Some restructuring will continue into 1995. A court case relating to a sister company (see Merhold, this page), in which Seabrooke is involved, could have implications for SA Bias.

The current price, at 275c, is above net worth of 244c. For the moment, the share should be viewed with caution.

There are several reasons for the collapse in share price in the past six months (from a high of 435c in December to 325c).

Investor confidence has suffered from an arduous restructuring programme, which so far has revealed little evidence of clear focus for the future. Indeed, the record shows a predilection for unfinished management configurations.

A drop in undiluted EPS — to 52c, from 1993’s 66c — was helped along by the R20m rights issue in February Logically enough, executive chairman Christopher Seabrooke observes this was not welcomed by investors.

But the worst blow was a Supreme Court hearing into an alleged fraud relating to properties sold to Eskom Pension Fund Seabrooke is an important State witness. The case has evoked strong public interest since it hit the headlines in April.

Evidence during the case reveals that a Merhold subsidiary may have contravened the Depositing Taking Institutions Act by failing to lodge tax returns. It appears Merchant Trade Finance (MTF) paid monthly interest for some years to 1993 on an R39m worth of credit balances held for various clients without notifying the Receiver of Revenue.

Seabrooke says the group is "being affected by press coverage of the trial". He contends the press has tainted the group's involvement unfairly. He argues that he isn't involved in the finer administration of MTF, and says he was unaware no IT3 forms had been submitted with regular tax forms.

The necessary documentation has now been submitted, the accountant concerned is no longer in Merhold's employ.

Seabrooke says restructuring has been slower than he would have liked. He expects the process to last another 18 months (It is intended that the company will eventually be divided into four facilities - financial services, electrical and two from the present industrial division, some of which Seabrooke claims are now operating well.) He hopes earnings will not suffer the effects of the restructuring for longer than a year.

"I expect attributable income to rise in 1995. The share price will follow only when the public recognises that restructuring has had positive results. So far, all we've had are assurances."

Complains in the Sabolith group - of which Merhold is one - regularly make use of extraordinaries. This year is no exception. Extraordinary items of more than R1m feature in the income statement, and include reclaims of trade, the write-off of an investment in CGS Instrumentation and listing expenses for New Republic Bank.

The adjourned trial resumes in October. With this hanging over Merhold, and Seabrooke's acknowledgment that investor confidence is unlikely to improve in the short term, it looks a stock to avoid.

Seabrooke says he'll be happy when the share reaches 500c. Asked when this may be, he replies "When your article is published" - a comment he quickly dismisses as "light-hearted". But it's more like wishful thinking.

Marshalls earns the bulk of its income from a property portfolio which comprises commercial properties and parking garages in Natal and the Western Cape.

Chairman and MD David Marshall says the average occupancy level for the financial year was about 94%, an improvement over the previous year. This firm market translated to a 10,1% increase in total rentals received (R13,2m), or about 12% at the pre-tax level, to R5,1m

While income-generating property makes up nearly three-quarters of pre-tax profits, Marshalls' Confirming Division (opened about seven years ago) is making a growing contribution. The division, launched to offset the gradual disposal of Marshalls' motor and agricultural distribution business, basically provides import financing to industrialists and merchants, Commissions, confirming fees and interest from the division contributed R3,8m to turnover (about 17%), and account for R1,4m (some 21%) of pre-tax profits.

It is clear this business works off healthy margins which are widening, though Marshall cautions that comparisons are misleading - results are coming off a low base due to a bad debt in the previous period. Still, turnover in this division has grown by about 51%, while pre-tax profits have shot up by 272%

Marshalls' traditionally conservative approach - and tight shareholdings structure, which has the family holding the majority of the equity with little for minorities - dampens what should be a better performing share.

Trading at a huge discount to NAV, the 39% increase in EPS should indicate a safe, if somewhat slow performing, investment for those interested in property group with a useful diversification.

But the severely restricted tradability of the shares take most of the shine off the investment.

Now the real battle begins. The trading margin reached 1,6% for the first time. That is still a good bit lower than, say, Pick n Pay's 2,2% - but now it's a question of how to fine-tune the business rather than just "hacking" it into shape. No longer can there be dispute about whether MD Whitey Basson and his team could create a viable entity out of the ashes of Checkers.

These results prove that it not only could be done, but within three years in a really tough recession. This is a real credit to Basson's highly motivated staff.

Yet, in a sense, the first three years are only the beginning. It was the easy part, because there was so much wrong. Most of the basic problems have been eliminated. Now the real quality of Basson's expertise will be tested. He must show that he can grow, rather than simply sustain, margin as turnover is expanded.
Manual to settle reform timeframe

Yuri Thumbran
and Bericia Klas

A KEY factor holding up investment decisions in the clothing and textiles industries — the timeframe for tariff reforms — will be disclosed when Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel announces his plans for the industries today.

Manuel will also announce final plans for the motor industry, which has seen a bitter feud develop between vehicle and component manufacturers after the Board on Tariffs and Trade made recommendations for reform.

It was speculated at the weekend that the clothing and textile industries would get a maximum of eight years in which protective tariffs were phased down.

This has been a major sticking point between the clothing and textile industries.

In terms of the GATT agreement, SA could get 12 years but the industries have accepted that it should be done more quickly.

Sources said factors which Manuel had to take into account were the textile industry’s contribution towards the balance of payments, shrinking clothing exports and trade union support for a longer phase-down period.

Last year textile exports rose 31% to R1.5bn, while clothing exports decreased 33% to R415m. According to sources the final duty levels would be 7.5% for fibres after eight years, 15% for yarn, 22% for fabrics and 40% for clothing.

Other concerns were that while SA had good export concessions in the EU and the US in terms of the multi-fibre agreement, those markets were already saturated by Asian countries.

Edward West reports that National Clothing Federation executive director Henne van Zyl said that the federation had called for a more rapid but phased reduction on tariffs than the 19 years being proposed by the Textile Federation. It also wanted a two-year tariff reduction period on yarns, four years on fabric and textiles, and eight years for clothing.

Van Zyl said it was unlikely that GATT was aware of the full circumstances within SA’s clothing and textile industries. “The evidence around the world is clear: the best way to become competitive is to reduce tariffs.

“Long-term protection of the textile industry has a cascading inflationary effect on clothing industry inputs. We structured our proposal so that the textile industry has time to become competitive.

Manuel

A structural adjustment programme was agreed to in 1993 with government, committing both sectors to a five-year tariff reduction period. To say we need 10 years is nonsense,” said Van Zyl.

Sources said at the weekend that the risk of the motor industry proposals were generally anticipated and accepted by the industries concerned.

They will include details of levels of duty free allowance, a timetable for the reduction of duties on completely built-up vehicles, and details of how export and imports could offset one another.

Econometric economist Tony Twene said the motor industry would take on a different shape over the next eight years as a result. The proposals would render certain parts and certain current practices of the industry unviable, he said.

The broader implications of the proposals were that the industry would have to comply with GATT, a maximum effective tariff of 30% and no subsidisation of exports out of the general fiscus.

Twene said the smaller issues were vital, but important to the various interests. A department spokesman said Manuel would allow “a short time” for comment. The proposals had been under discussion for some time, he said.
Promise of cheaper cars and clothes

Bold plan to slash tariffs

Tim Cohen

CAPE TOWN — Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel yesterday unveiled final proposals for dramatic reform of the motor, textile and clothing industries designed to compel SA industry to become internationally competitive.

The proposals came after years of intensive negotiations and countless deadlocks over the way in which SA would get rid of its protective walls.

The plans will ultimately result in significantly cheaper cars and clothes, with the proposed phased tariff reductions to under half their current levels, outstripping SA’s GATT offer in all sectors.

Clothing and textile industry representatives were yesterday given a month to comment on the reports while a new committee was set up to discuss the motor industry proposals.

After a briefing of senior representatives from both industries yesterday, Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel said there was broad agreement on the architecture of the proposals. “Surprisingly, there was no blood on the carpet.”

It was agreed by motor industry representatives that September 1 would be the outside date for implementation. In the meantime, a task group with three representatives from government, the trade unions and both the vehicle and component manufacturers would be set up.

Manuel said the task group would “flush out the proposals as they stand now”, with an interim report due on July 1. Manuel indicated his support for the current set of proposals saying “We have workable proposals that we can go with.”

The Board on Tariffs and Trade’s motor industry proposal differs little from its predecessor last year, except that the duty-free allowance offered in manufacturers on components has been reduced from 35% to 27% of the value of the parts involved.

The motor industry proposals suggest abandoning the local content system driven by excise duties — and its replacement with a programme driven by steadily reducing customs duties, offering duty-free allowances and an import/export trade balance rebate.

Import duty on built-up motor cars, commercial vehicles and minibuses would shrink from a planned 65% this year to 40% by 2002 by roughly four percentage points every year, while support for components would decrease from 48% this year to 30% in eight years.

SA committed polyester fibre from 25% to 7.5%.

Some relief would be offered with a 50% subsidy on management consultancy fees for five years and the continuance of the duty credit certificate scheme, which gives exporters relief on import duties.

Manuel said new conditions on training, productivity increases and human resource development would apply.

Manuel indicated he did not concur with the Swart Panel Report’s suggestion for support to be provided for the capitalisation of new technology because it was probably not necessary.

He was concerned about “leakage” in the clothing sector at customs posts, and discussions were taking place with the finance department.

On balance of payments problems that might arise from the deep tariff reductions, Trade and Industry director-general Zawesh Rushongwa said the whole system was designed to be net BoP positive. Given SA’s latent competitive advantages in its engineering industry, there were possibilities for “massive” BoP improvements.

Asked why the tariff reduction proposals were of shorter time periods than SA’s GATT proposals, Manuel said the critical period for the industries would be the next four years. “We are suggesting that if people don’t move soon, they are going to die in any event and there is no point in dragging that dead horse on.”

National Association of Automotive and Allied Manufacturers president John Brandner said Manuel’s proposals for a task group to discuss the role the motor industry was “fair”, although the components industry was still highly critical of the scheme.

He said there was little change from

The Wool Industry has rejected the long-term plan for the clothing and textile industries.

Mervyn King said: “The minister’s ruling ends years of uncertainty and will give the industry the opportunity to implement the plan it has drawn up to become internationally competitive.”

Marcel Krilans reports the National Union of Metalworkers of SA said its initial impression was “that it (the motor industry plan) lacks the interventionist approach we felt was necessary for a long-term programme in this industry.”

Yuri Tshumsky reports the Clothing Federation rejected the long-term plan for the clothing and textile industries.
Less protection for clothing and textile industry

BY BRUCE CAMERON

Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel hopes his proposed shake up of the clothing and textile industry will retain existing jobs, create new jobs and leave the industries internationally competitive.

Manuel has attempted to find a compromise between the textile, clothing and clothing retailers while sticking to his guns on enforcing the industries to be competitive.

He has recommended the tariff structure on clothing be reduced from the present 30% to 40%, household fabrics from 55% to 30%, fabrics from 45% to 25%, yarn from 32% to 15%, and polyester fibre from 25% to 7.5%.

Ad valorem rates would be reduced over eight years and specific duties over four years, with a possible one year extension.

All rebates on duties would be phased out within ten years. Other recommendations include:

- A 50% subsidy on management consultancy fees for a period of five years to help companies restructure. Manuel expects this to cost R5-million a year.
- The continuation of the Duty Credit Certificate scheme for three years (including this year) under which clothing manufacturers get rebates on import duties of primary material if they invest in training and productivity programmes.
- Assistance with the upgrading of technology through the Industrial Development Corporation and other institutions.
- The lifting of import control on clothing.
- The creation of an efficient anti-dumping unit and improved efficiency of customs control.
- No support for stabilising the cotton price.
- No subsidy for wool export marketing assistance, but the Department of Trade and Industries would hold an immediate investigation into the wool industry.
- The development of a training programme for people in the industries under the Department of Labour forum, including the departments of Labour and of Trade and Industry, the labour unions and the private sector, would assist in developing the programme.
- That textile and clothing small business issues be included in the national policy for small businesses in general, although they would benefit from reduced tariffs.

Manuel said with the recommendations the aim was to have the industries competitive within ten years.
Radical restructuring plan will take eight years, says Manuel

Yuri Thumber

TRADE and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel yesterday announced that quantitative controls on clothing imports would be lifted as part of a radical restructuring of the clothing and textiles industries.

Manuel announced an eight-year period for the two industries to phase down tariffs, which he bashed the 10 years agreed on in the tripartite Swart Panel. Rebates of duties, which could be claimed on goods purchased for the manufacture of export products, would be phased out over 10 years.

At the end of the restructuring period, the tariffs would be reduced as follows: clothing from 90% to 40%, household textiles from 85% to 30%, fabrics from 45% to 23%, yarn from 32% to 15% and polyester fibre from 25% to 15%.

In line with the Swart Panel report’s recommendation on supply-side measures, Manuel said there was a need for an efficient anti-dumping unit and efficient customs control. Small business, which had been one of the sticking points between the textiles and clothing industries, did not get any special mention, but the issue would be referred for inclusion in the national policy being developed for small business.

Training, which had become a prerequisite for credits on import duties, would be referred to the labour department and a forum would be established for the development of a programme. Aside from the departments of labour and trade and industry, the unions and business would also take part in the forum.

Manuel said his vision was to achieve international competitiveness for the clothing and textile industries within 10 years.

Manuel’s decision was aimed at minimal job losses in the textile industry, the creation of formal and informal jobs in the clothing sector, and a greater export orientation.

Manuel said both industries had the ability to become internationally competitive, while it had a major advantage in not being subject to the multilateral agreement (MFA). The MFA limited clothing and textiles exports from developing nations to developed ones.

Manuel also announced that technology upgrades would be financed by the Industrial Development Corporation and other external institutions. There would be no support for the stabilisation of the cotton price, and no subsidy for wool marketing assistance, but the trade and industry department would investigate the wool issue separately.
Long-term plan does not meet expectations

Yuri Thumbran

THE Clothing Federation (Clofed) has rejected Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel’s long-term plan for the clothing and textiles industry, which included an eight-year phase-down period for tariffs.

Manuel’s plan, which was unveiled yesterday, included most of the recommendations of the Swart panel report which was finalised last year, except for a shorter phase-down period of eight years instead of 10 years.

The Swart panel was a forum of government, business and labour set up to reach consensus on reform.

Key elements in the recommendations were the development of some supply-side measures advocated by the panel, including training and customs control.

Both industries have the chance to respond to Manuel’s proposals, before they meet on July 11 to finalise all details.

Clofed deputy president Bernard Richards said the plan did not meet expectations. Manuel had opted for a longer, rather than a shorter, phase-down on textiles.

“Naturally the clothing industry would have been happier with a four-year phase-down on duty levels for textiles,” he said.

Richards was critical of the 5% increase a year on the maximum duties, applicable to those textiles not available in SA, which could lead to higher inflation in the clothing sector. But the minimum duties that government could set were scheduled to decline by 10% a year.

Richards expressed concern that the plan would have a negative effect on trading partners in the European Union, who could impose similar measures on SA.

But he noted that the removal of import control on clothing would have no effect on the local industry.

Textile Federation president Mervyn King said the textile industry would go full steam ahead with plans to remodel itself following Manuel’s recommendations.

He said the announcement would give the textile industry the chance to implement its plans for R5bn capital expenditure, workplace reorganisation and training.

King said Manuel’s package was practical, reasonable and workable, given the fact of fiscal constraints on government.

“The ruling ends years of uncertainty and will give the industry the opportunity to implement the plans it has drawn up to become competitive internationally,” he said.

The SA Clothing and Textile Workers’ Union said it would respond tomorrow to the proposals.

Manuel’s plans were widely welcomed by analysts yesterday.

One analyst said common sense had prevailed and the market had discounted the very worst into the share prices of the sector because of the uncertainty.
New deal ahead for ragtrade

ALIDE DASNOIS
Business Editor

TRADE and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel has given the warning textile and clothing industries one month to respond to a far-reaching plan to slash import tariffs in half in eight years.

"There was no blood on the floor," said Mr Manuel at a media briefing in Cape Town yesterday after presenting the plan to representatives of the Textile Federation (Textex) and the Clothing Federation (Clothfed).

The two have been at each other's throats for months on the question of import tariffs, with Clothfed claiming that high textile tariffs were strangling small clothing manufacturers.

Mr Manuel's compromise plan involves the phasing down of ad valorem tariffs over eight years and of specific duties over four or possibly five years, with a mid-term review in three years time.

At the end of the period, tariffs on clothing will have been chopped from an average 90 percent to 40 percent, on household textiles from 55 percent to 30 percent, on fabrics from 45 percent to 25 percent, on yarn 22 percent to 15 percent and on polyester fibre from 25 percent to 7.5 percent.

The double objective of the long-awaited plan is to bring South African industry in line with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) signed by the government in Morocco last year, and to protect employment in both industries over the critical period ahead.

Mr Manuel said a number of factors had been taken into account in drawing up the plan, including productivity, investment, the growth of companies outside the industrial council system and South Africa's place in the region.

Within 10 years, he said, the South African textile and clothing industries should be well on the way to international competitiveness and sustainable development and there would no longer be any need to lobby the government.

Job losses in the textile industry should be offset by a net creation of jobs in clothing.

Duty credit certificates and export incentives would be awarded to companies which met defined productivity targets.

Given current investment trends in the textile-clothing pipeline, Mr Manuel said, it seemed that government support for investment in new technology would not be necessary. But the Industrial Development Corporation could provide low interest loans if needed for technological upgrading.

Other issues of concern were the need to support small and medium enterprises and the leakage through the customs net of cheap clothing imports.

Representatives of the Department of Finance were abroad looking into solutions into this problem, he said.

The degree of agreement on the plan yesterday had "been quite remarkable". Industry representatives had got the message that there was no point in dissipating any more energy on a quarrel and that the government was deaf to lobbying.

Mr Manuel said it was hard to tell whether or not the plan would be approved by the industries concerned.

The proposals would also have to be approved by the SA Clothing and Textile Workers Union, which had "acted as a bridge" between the parties, and by South Africa's partners in the Southern African Customs Union.

Meanwhile a motor industry task group had been set up to flesh out proposals for a new development programme due to come into effect on September 1. Mr Manuel said The task group, comprising three representatives of the motor car manufacturers, the components industry and the National Union of Metal Workers of SA (Numsa) was to present an interim report at the end of July.

Key proposals for the motor industry included:

■ A duty free allowance calculated against exports.
■ Cuts in import tariffs from 80 percent to 40 percent on completely built-up (CBU) vehicles within eight years (tariffs have already been reduced from 115 percent since June 1981), and
■ The scrapping of the local content requirements.
Clothing manufacturers disappointed

Recommending a price phase down for the textile and clothing industry by Trevor Manuel, the minister of trade and industry, are something of a coup for the textile sector and a bitter disappointment for the clothing fraternity.

Mervyn Kug, president of the Textile Federation (Texfed), said that given the cloth available the minister had cut a reasonable, practical and workable cost.

Kug said the minister's ruling had ended years of uncertainty in line with international norms or, it had given the textile sector a chance to remodel itself through implementing a R3 billion capital expenditure, workplace reorganisation and training plan.

He is confident the month-long respite given to the main players to respond to the package presented yesterday would not deliver any major changes.

The clothing fraternity has other ideas with Clotho Federation vice-president Bernard Richards issuing an ominous "time will tell" warning.

He welcomed the month-long respite which would enable representatives from the clothing industry to "return to their structures" for revised mandates.

Richards warned that fixing duty levels higher than the 13 percent recommended by the Clotho Federation would have an inflationary effect on clothing prices.

He said yesterday's proposals would send the wrong signals at a crucial time when South African clothing manufacturers were desperately trying to negotiate access to European markets.

In contrast, textile manufacturers view the new ruling as a signal to aggressively forge ahead with efforts to become competitive in international markets.

Ramate's chairman Jack Cronley described the proposed new dispensation as sensible and appropriate Smaller textile operations such as David Whitehead, Clegina and SA Nylon Spanners left comment to the Textile Federation.

Kug's overall comment was jubilant: "We now have enormous confidence in the future of the South African textile industry and the upbeat trend reflected in results reported by textile companies over the past few months can be expected to continue.

"Our long-suffering shareholders can now look forward to a resting of the sector on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange."

Texfed is holding out an olive branch, hoping that yesterday's announcement will encourage operation along the entire pipeline, particularly in training and small business development.

"We repeat our call for the creation of a port textile clothing federation, something which exists in many other countries and yet has been unthinkable in South Africa," Kug said.

The clothing and textiles federations have been fighting a long-running battle for years, with textile manufacturers wanting more protection and clothing manufacturers calling for it to be reduced. They have been given a month in which to consult their members and make new submissions to the minister.
Manuel slashes tariff protection

By BRIAN CAMERON

Fundamental restructuring of the clothing, textile and motor industries, with major reductions in tariff protection barriers and the scrapping of local content requirements for the motor industry have been announced by Trevor Manuel, trade and industry minister.

The release of the programmes today followed months of controversy and lobbying, with fears roused that all three industries could be significantly damaged by the removal of the tariff barriers which were put in place during the sanctions era.

Manuel hoped to save thousands of jobs within the programmes, while making motor vehicles and basic clothing and textiles cheaper.

As to the success of the programmes, the minister said all three industries had no option but to adapt and this was recognised particularly by the unions.

Manuel briefed all ten of the industries. He said there was “no blood on the floor” but some reservations had been voiced about whether enough was being done on supply side measures, which included upgrading training and technology.

The clothing and textile industries had been given a month to consider proposals. A task force representing government departments, labour and employers was set up to consider the recommendations for the motor industry.

The programmes for the clothing and textile industries were completed by the trade and industry department. The recommendations for the motor industry were made by the Board of Tariffs and Trade.

For the motor industry, the local content programme would be dropped and a new system of reduced and tradable duties would be introduced.

In the process, the range of motor vehicles assembled in South Africa is likely to decrease and prices are expected to come down.

In the clothing and textile industries Manuel has opted for a compromise between demands for a 10-year phasing out of tariffs demanded by the textile industry and the five years on textiles wanted by the clothing industry.

Manuel said that the reduction of tariffs in all three industries would be counterbalanced by intensive programmes to upgrade training, technology and management skills.

The upgrading of supply side inputs would enable the industries to become internationally competitive in both local markets and export markets.

In the clothing and textile industries he has taken measures to improve management, technology and training to make them more internationally competitive.

Manuel said these would be phased reductions in the textile and clothing industries over eight years for ad valorem rates and over four years for specific duties, with a possible one-year extension.

The decrease would be a minimum rate of 10 percent a year.

Manufacturers: the struggle continues

BY AUDREY D'ANGELO

Clothing manufacturers will continue to lobby for protective duties on textiles and other inputs to be phased out more quickly than suggested by the Minister of Trade and Industry, Trevor Manuel, their representatives said last night.

The vice president of the National Clothing Federation of South Africa (NCF), Bernard Richards, said he was also concerned by the fact that maximum duties on certain fabrics imported from Europe, and not made in South Africa, would go up by five percent.

The clothing and textiles federations — which have been fighting a long-running battle for years with textile manufacturers wanting more protection and clothing manufacturers calling for it to be reduced, have been given a month in which to consult their members and make new submissions to the minister.

Richards and Peter Cragg, executive director of the Cape Clothing Manufacturers Association, said they would call for input from members for a new submission to the minister.

Richards said the NCF was disappointed by the announcement. “We called for a four-year phasedown of duties. We wanted a staggered phase-down so that most protection was given furthest down the pipeline where the industry is most labour-intensive.”

He thought the 5% rise in the maximum specific formula import duties on some fabrics imported from Europe would be inflationary. It might also provoke a reaction from Europe, which was an export market for South African manufacturers.

Richards said it was encouraging that the minister had promised to deal with customs leakages but until they were actually stopped, the programme was subject to all sorts of dangers. “It is like putting the plug in when the bathwater is already out.”
Illegal imports 'harming clothing, textile industry'

John Dunn

ILLEGAL clothing and textile imports worth more than R1bn were passing through SA's lax customs controls every year, Textile Federation (Textex) executive director Brian Brink said yesterday.

He said there was a need to tighten customs controls to stem the flood of imports escaping duties and harming local industries.

'The figure could be a lot higher — we can't tell, because by their very nature these imports are fraudulent,' Brink said.

This follows Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel's statement that government believed illegal imports added about 29% to the import bill.

Brink said the problem was so rampant that Textex had offered to help government by seconding technical experts to the underresourced customs and excise department.

The experts would assist with the identification of products at points of entry, duty checks and the inspection of documentation.

However, Brink said such an offer could not be accepted under the current Customs and Excise Act, which insisted on confidentiality regarding customs control.

'Unless we lift this veil of secrecy, it will be impossible to second officials to government,' he said.

Deputy customs commissioner Izak Coetzee said Finance Minister Chris Liebenberg had asked his special adviser Charles Strade and customs commissioner Daan Colesky to draw up a business plan aimed at improving efficiency.

'Criminals are getting better than us (customs officials),' Coetzee said.

A team of experts was studying ways of improving the department, while Strade and Colesky were currently overseas studying moves to restructure the inland revenue and customs and excise departments in other countries.
he calls the "definitive" report for restructuring the clothing and textile industries.

Admittedly inheriting a problem which plagued previous governments, Manuel has tried to steer a middle course through a proverbial minefield.

The crucial textile tariff recommendations propose eight years in which to reduce tariffs on textiles from 55% to 30%, fabrics from 45% to 22%, yarn from 32% to 15% and polyester fibre from 25% to 7.5%.

The 11 recommendations of the report include the "need for an efficient anti-dumping unit; (and) efficient customs control."

Though the clothing industry is disappointed, the textile industry can hardly contain its delight. Its federation responded with an announcement of "full steam ahead" with its R3bn capital expenditure.

workplace reorganisation and training plans now set in motion to remodel itself.

It says government adhered to the recommendations of the Swart plan, with only a two-year reduction in the tariff phase-down period — from 10 to eight years.

Says Textile Federation president Mervyn King "We now have enormous confidence in the future of the textile industry and the upbeat trend reflected in results reported by textile companies over the past few months will continue and improve. Our long-suffering shareholders can look forward to a rating of the sector on the JSE."

King also asks for the creation of a joint textile-clothing federation, which exists in many other countries and "yet has been unthinkable in SA until now." He says major retailers should be drawn into the joint body. King also offers assistance in helping to upgrade SA’s "appalling" customs service, where too few officers cannot keep up check corruption which he says is "rife."

The National Clothing Federation is not happy and plans to respond within the month allowed by Manuel, says vice-president Bernard Richards.

Says Richards "We asked for a four-year phase-out period for textile tariffs — instead we got eight. We are also concerned that the success of the programme is conditional on the stopping of customs leakages. While the Minister estimates these leakages at about 20%-30% above official import trade figures, we fear illegal imports could exceed 30%". He says that unless grey trade is stopped, "the plan will have no force or effectiveness."

But he is happy with the three-year extension of the Duty Credit Certificate system, which will assist clothing exporters.

No mention is made in the report of Gans as this is seen as a separate trade issue.

Market sources say Manuel’s plan may help to halt the long-standing battle between the clothing industry (employing 160,000, with sales of R6.1bn a year) and the textile industry (82,000 workers with annual turnover of R7.9bn).
Tariff reforms put clothing in the cold

By CIARAN RYAN

A CASUALTY of Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel’s reform package for the clothing and textiles industries will be low value-added clothing, according to industry spokesmen.

While the long-term plan for the clothing and textiles industry was generally welcomed, Mr. Soni was pleased.

Shirish Soni, head of the Consultative Business Forum, slammed the proposals, warning of large-scale job losses when the duty credit certificate scheme, which allows exporters to import a percentage of the raw material requirements free of duty, phases out in about two years.

“I am tired of this debate,” says Mr. Soni. The minister with all his good intentions has bowed to pressure from Mervyn King and the three or four large textile companies who stand to benefit most from it. Nowhere in this package is there any vision of how many jobs we are going to create or where the industry is going. The supposed retention of jobs is not quantified and, once again, the poorest of society are going to pay the most punitive duties.”

Mr. Soni says textile and clothing companies will run back to the minister in three years once job losses and company failures start to mount.

“In three years we will be back to square one,” he says. “The clothing industry will start to suffer heavily in the fourth year, when minimum specific duties start to fall. This will open the door to a flood of low-value clothing imports and it will pay people to become large-scale importers.”

The Textile Federation says the minister’s plan struck a balance between the demands of the clothing and textile industries and could stimulate job creation, “provided companies take the necessary steps to restructure and provided the plan encompasses an element of growth.”

Brian Brick, executive director of Texfed, says there are signs that textile companies have started to step up their capital spending: “Many were holding back on capital spending because of the uncertainty surrounding the industry. I do not believe this plan will result in job losses as the short term. In the longer term I believe it will create jobs, but this is conditional on the stance of organised labour to a large degree.”

Mr. Manuel announced that quantitative controls on clothing imports would be lifted and ad valorem tariffs phased down over eight years instead of the 10 originally envisaged in the Swart Panel recommendations. This is still longer than the four-year phase-down proposed by the National Clothing Federation, but shorter than the 12 years envisaged in South Africa’s offer to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Minimum specific duties are likely to be phased down over four years with a possible one-year extension.

Clothing tariffs are to fall from an average 60% to 40%, household textiles from 55% to 30%, fabrics from 45% to 22%, yarn from 32% to 15% and polyester fibre from 25% to 7.5%.

Anti-dumping measures and customs control are to be strengthened. Mr. Manuel announced the formation of a training forum and a 50% subsidy on management consultancy fees for five years. He said the purpose of the plan was to make the industry globally competitive in 10 years. No subsidy is to be given for investment in plant upgrades, although the Industrial Development Corporation and others would finance plant and equipment.

One motor industry executive predicted the death of South Africa’s heavy truck industry by the end of the decade. Duties on heavy trucks are slated to fall from the current 70% to 20% over eight years. Eleven truck makers produce about 10 000 heavy trucks a year.
Clothing: New state policy proposed

Government should not substantially support the "unproductive" clothing industry in the long term, as it is unlikely to ever be wildly successful in export markets.

This is one of the recommendations of Industrial Strategy Project researcher Miriam Altman.

Altman's research was drawn on by the government in its recent policy statement on the future of the clothing and textile industries.

Respite

Clothing manufacturers had to get away from the mindset of static strategies, which argued that if cost of production was high, it was because of high wage bills.

Instead of mechanisation and retrenchments, which offered only short-term respite, manufacturers should rather look at the real problems.

Research, both locally and abroad, showed South African firms paid little attention to shorter production cycles, modular production, total quality control, reduced inventories and a more skilled workforce.

An essential part of better shop floor management was an improved grading system of workers, which among other things resulted in better pay, a wider spread of skills.

Incentives

She said a clothing textile development office should be established to co-ordinate restructuring of the industries, develop regional support services, monitor developments, supervise the use or abuse of export incentives and promote exports.

The country did have some competitive advantages including market access, preparedness to accept relatively short orders compared to eastern producers and good communication and transport links with global markets.

The limited support given by government should include improved export incentives, particularly help with marketing, while inadequate protection should be provided.
Littlewoods plans to buy from Cape firms

Edward Wesman

CAPE TOWN — Littlewoods, the £2,700m-a-year UK-based football pools and retail group, plans to source clothing from SA for the first time via two Cape-based firms, Toweres Edgar Jacobs (TEJ) and Pals Clothing.

This was announced yesterday by Littlewoods clothing chief John Moores.

Earlier this year Littlewoods also announced it would bid for a licence to operate a football pool in SA, but Moores said these plans had been “put on ice” after the SA government announced that football pools could only be established a year after a national lottery was formed in SA.

Football pools accounted for only 15% of Littlewoods’ turnover, most of which was derived from retail and index catalogue shopping services.

Moores said the company had previously been precluded from doing business with SA by its code of conduct on merchandise procurement with specific reference to worker rights, minimum wages and working conditions in the company of manufacture.

He said that Littlewoods intended procuring clothing from other SA producers in future, as soon as a 14% ad valorem duty paid by SA clothing exporters to the UK was abolished.

Littlewoods procured about £100m of knitwear annually mainly for middle income group retail markets.

There was a world shortage of fully fashioned knitwear and the quality of tailoring in SA was good, he said.

“Teju MD Tony Owen said exports had had a dramatic impact on results since the group began its export drive three years ago. Current operations were trading satisfactorily and the company was meeting budgets.”
Littlewoods to help boost local clothing exports

BY AUDREY D'ANGELO  CAPE BUSINESS EDITOR

The British Littlewoods group — with mail order companies and chain stores in Britain and retail operations in Russia — will source as much of its clothing as possible in South Africa, John Moores, the chairman, announced yesterday.

He said at a news conference in the Cape Town factory of TEJ (Towles Edgar Jacobs), which will become a major supplier, that this was due partly to a wish to help provide jobs in South Africa and partly because of the high quality of the goods.

Preferential

A major disadvantage to importing clothes from South Africa was that, even with the preferential rebates granted by the European Union, 12 percent import duty had to be paid. But now that South Africa was again in the Commonwealth he hoped this would be lifted soon.

Littlewoods would also buy clothing from the PALS factory in Cape Town. Moores said he was looking for other suppliers in this country.

He could not give an amount for the quantity of clothing his group would buy from South Africa, except to say that they would be “substantial.”

But a spokesman for the group said only 19 percent of Littlewoods’ annual income of $2.7 billion came from football pools.

The bulk of its income came from its retail and catalogue shopping operations which employed 30,000 people.

Moores said he had been a frequent visitor to South Africa, but his company’s strict code of practice had prevented it from doing any business with South Africa in the past.

It had asked Cosatu to recommend companies where conditions of employment were satisfactory.

Discussing the competitiveness of South African-made clothing, Moores said it could not compete with the Far East on “cheap sewing items like blouses.”

But it had niche market skills in tailoring and fully fashioned knittedwear. He said there was a world shortage of fully fashioned knittedwear of the sort made by TEJ.

Littlewoods’ main source of supply at the moment was Scotland, said Moores.

Tony Owen, TEJ managing director, said South African clothing manufacturers needed big overseas customers like Littlewoods to provide them with a large enough market to achieve economies of scale.

“Orders from companies like Littlewoods are vital to us. We have to grow our business internationally.”

TEJ started exporting only two years ago. Exports already accounted for 10 percent of turnover.
Clothing sector agreement close

Staff Reporter

AS thousands of workers took to the streets this week to demand that government force business into centralised bargaining, bosses and labour leaders in the clothing sector were putting the finishing touches to this year's mostly centrally bargained wage negotiations.

South African Clothing and Textile Workers Union general secretary Jabu Ncobo said: "The spirit in which the union and employers from all sectors approached the centralised bargaining over wages was encouraging."

"I am optimistic that a more harmonious relationship with employers will prevail if this style of good-faith negotiating continues in the future."

The union and employers have settled wage agreements in three major sectors - cotton, leather, and knitting - and are presently reporting back to members.

Nine sectors were negotiated at central level, with the worsted and clothing sectors also nearing settlement, Mr Ncobo said.

"In the cotton sector, employers from decentralised areas had to pay close to 80 percent increases to catch up with entry-level wages paid in other areas. A six-year plan to bridge the wage gap has been agreed to."

In the leather sector, agreement had been reached on a 13 percent across-the-board wage increase between the union and the Footwear Manufacturers Federation.

In the clothing sector, the union and bosses agreed to a 13 percent wage increase, and employer contributions of R20 a worker each month to the union's bursary fund. The settlement is being put to workers by union officials, with Mr Ncobo confident of signing "soon."

"We will not accept anything less than centralised bargaining in all sectors in 1996," said Mr Ncobo.

"Unlike in the past, the new South African government and the union are not prepared to baby-sit those employers from the ex-homelands, and foreign investors, who pay R30 to R40 a week in wages. They will be forced to respect the law," Mr Ncobo said.

The country's three trade union federations - the Congress of South African Trade Unions, Federation of South African Labour and National Council of Trade Unions - have united on a program of rolling mass action aimed at forcing the government to incorporate obligations to centralised bargaining and the right to strike in the proposed new Labour Relations Act.
Clothing industry seeks support for joint export initiative

ALIDE DASNOIS
Business Editor

THE clothing industry, slated for poor export performance in the report of the Industrial Strategy Project this week, is looking for support from the Department of Trade and Industries for a joint export initiative with textile producers CLI 1986/96.

Clothing Federation (Clofed) director Hennie van Zyl said the federation was hoping for a formal meeting soon with the department to introduce the South African Clothing and Textile Export Council (Sactec).

Sactec would be open to all clothing and textile manufacturers with an interest in exports.

It would be independent of Clofed and the Textile Federation (Textex), with its own board of directors and its own budget.

Mr van Zyl said manufacturers were hoping for seed money of about R1 million from the Department of Trade and Industry. Thereafter Sactec would be funded through an export turnover levy on manufacturers, probably of 0.5 percent or less.

Small and medium enterprises would be charged a nominal fee for membership.

The Council would be headed by a director and would probably have two deputy directors, one in charge of export promotion and the other in charge of administration.

Its mission would be to improve the export performance of the clothing and textile industries with a view to creating new jobs.

In a study by UCT's Industrial Strategy Project released this week, researcher Miriam Altman slammed the clothing industry's lack of productivity.

"The bottom line is that the clothing industry is unlikely to ever be wildly successful in export markets and so unproductive that it is not the sort of industry that government should substantially support in the long-run."

South African manufacturers did have a short-term competitive advantage on world markets, Ms Altman said, because South Africa was not a member of the Multifibre Agreement and so did not have to face quota barriers. But the Multifibre Agreement was due to be scrapped in terms of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

Other competitive advantages included good communications and transport links with global markets and willingness on the part of producers to accept shorter orders, which Asian manufacturers could not accept.

Disadvantages included distance from main export markets, a weak domestic textile industry and slow throughput times.

South African clothing manufacturers should not try to compete at the lower end of the export market, dominated by suppliers in the Far East, they should concentrate on middle-of-the-range seasonal, fashion or basic items.

The government should use a "carrot and stick" approach to the industry, offering better export incentives and some import protection, Ms Altman said.

Mr van Zyl said he disagreed with "sweeping statements" on the industry as a whole.

"In any case, other studies, such as the Monitor Report, have found large sections of the clothing industry to be competitive. Competitiveness on world markets depends on competition within the industry and in South Africa there's strong competition.

Barriers to entry are low and abnormal profits in any area soon attract a surge of new entrants."

"But I agree that our niche will be in small batch, quick response manufacturing, which is a vast market in world terms."

He said one obstacle to competitiveness for the South African clothing industry was the high cost of inputs. In this respect the proposals on tariff cuts for textiles put forward by Trade and Industry minister Trevor Manuel last week were "disappointing."

Mr Manuel suggested slashing import tariffs on clothing and textiles by about half over a period of eight years.

Clofed's executive committee would meet in Johannesburg next week to consider reactions from members to Mr Manuel's suggestions.

"But I can say right now that we're disappointed. It looks as though, once again, labour-intensive industry has lost out," Mr van Zyl said.
Centralised bargaining successful

Clothing workers have upped wages with centralised bargaining

By Abdul Milazi
Labour Reporter

While the issue of centralised bargaining is threatening to tear the labour industry apart nationally, it has got off to a good start in the clothing and textile industry.

South African Clothing and Textile Workers Union general secretary Mr Jabu Ngcobo says the union has used centralised bargaining in nine sectors and has reached wage agreements in the cotton, leather and knitting industries.

Sactwu, which is affiliated to the Congress of South African Trade Unions, is the biggest union in the clothing and textile industry with a membership of 180 000.

"Employers in the decentralised areas had to give close to 80 percent increases to catch up with entry level wages paid in other areas," said Ngcobo.

He said a six-year plan to bridge the wage gap between the highest and lowest paid workers has been agreed upon by both employers' associations and the union.

"In the leather sector, a 13 percent across the board wage increase has been reached by the union and the Footwear Manufacturers' Federation," said Ngcobo.

Issues such as the abolition of the dual pay system, union consultation before the employment of contract workers and affirmative action have been referred to a special committee made up of representatives of both parties. See page 10.
Sactwu wage settlements reached

The SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) achieved settlements from 13% to more than 30% in the footwear and cotton textile sectors.

According to the union a 13% wage increase was achieved in the footwear sector, which falls under the broader leather industry.

This settlement will raise the minimum wage in the sector to R237,02 a week. It was agreed to refer issues such as affirmative action, contract labour, employment and shop steward leave for training to sub-committees.

The first year of centralised bargaining within the industry's newly formed industrial council has resulted in the agreement of a minimum entry level to the industry of R220 a week and an average wage of R300.

Sactwu general secretary Jabu Ngcobo said employers in decentralised areas had to pay close to 80% increases.

Those employers paying an average of above the average would grant across the board increases ranging between R31 to R36 a week depending on skill levels.

Provisions have also been made for a six-year plan to bridge the wage gap. The catch-up amount would begin this year and would be paid in two installments. As from July 1 this year employers would pay an extra R6.66 a week, bringing the entry wage up to R236.66 a week.
Body hopes to raise exports

Shel JOHNSON

In a reconciliatory move described as "the most important development in the economic history of the South African clothing and textile industries," textile and clothing federations have announced the creation of a dedicated, independent export council.

To be known as the South African Clothing and Textile Export Council, the council will be the first of its kind in the country and will be based on similar councils in Britain and Taiwan.

The council will comprise members of both industries, but operate independently from existing industry structures in terms of decision making, staffing and financing.

The two federations, Clofed and Texted, said that initial funding would be needed, including an ex gratia payment from the trade and industry department.

The council's brief is to facilitate job creation through export performance, now at least 10 percent of domestic production.
INDUSTRIAL POLICY

No pain, no gain

Sensible long-term policy proposals have given way to compromise

Trevor Manuel is no Jonah Lomu. The giant All Black winger knows where he wants to go and will trample all in his path to reach there. SA's Trade & Industry Minister also knows his goals but, unlike Lomu, he is worried about treading those in the way.

That's certainly the impression coming out of the two industrial strategy documents approved by government last week — one for the motor industry and the other for clothing and textiles. What started out as genuine attempts to revitalise industries distorted by protection and to create world-competitive sectors, have been drowned along the way as turning into minimum pain programmes.

Driven, to a degree, by the need to meet the trading requirements of Gatt, the proposals appear to some to offer the minimum needed to comply. Brave statements about creating competitive industries have been obscured by expediency.

When Derek Keys, the former Minister of Finance and of Trade & Industry, created a task group in October 1992 to devise a new long-term policy for the motor industry, he apparently envisaged something that would turn the industry on its head. That's certainly how Derek Riley, who was task group chairman, saw it. He and his group were confronted by an industry made inefficient by years of protection and successive government-imposed local content programmes.

Put simply, there were — and are — too many vehicle manufacturers making too many models for the size of the market. Economies of scale, both for the manufacturers and for the component companies that supported them, were negligible. Nor was there much pressure to improve, not when the industry was protected from foreign competition by tariff barriers of over 100% on built-up vehicles.

Also, the continued reliance on imported components exposed the industry to dangerous cost penalties as the rand continued its slide against foreign currencies. For consumers, the bottom line was vehicle prices that escalated beyond the rate of inflation. New vehicles were becoming unaffordable. This was reflected in falling sales and the marginalisation of private buyers in a market dominated by fleet and company sales.

The task group produced two reports: one on cars and light commercial vehicles, and the second on medium and heavy commercials. The latter was less sensitive. In terms of both sales and employment, it is a minor part of the industry, and the economic effects of reduced protection are likely to be limited. So while car makers face a final import protection tariff of 40% by the year 2002, the truck sector will be down to 20% two years earlier.

For local manufacturers of truck engines, transmissions, tyres and axles, it will be 15%.

The attitude of this sector is summed up by MD of Atlantis Diesel Engines (ADE) Ron Shires, who says his company has been diversifying for years in the knowledge that eventually they will no longer be able to rely on their traditional core business.

The report on cars and light commercial vehicles immediately touched some nerves. It recommended gradually reduced protection tariffs that would hit a base of 45%. As important, other proposals included once-off reparation, penalty on manufacturers failing to build minimum volumes of individual models, and minimum averages across their total product range.

The intention was to force manufacturers to reduce model proliferation. If it also resulted in one or two companies being forced out of the market, then so be it, in fact, much the better. Riley, in fact, thought these proposals didn't go far enough and described them as "too cozy."

The report, effectively, was a majority view among industry's warning factions. The depth of disagreement became clear when vehicle manufacturers, through the National Association of Automobile Manufacturers (Naamsa), presented their own comments to the report, disagreeing with many of its findings.

As industry analyst Tony Twine, from Econometrics, notes, by the time the Board on Tariffs & Trade (BTT) produced its first set of proposals based on the task group report, they were more a reflection of the Naamsa document.

Many of the task group recommendations survived. But casualties included the penalties for failing to meet minimum-volume targets, never to be seen again. The BTT took the view that the 45% tariff protection target was too high, and cut it to 30% — only to raise it to 40% in its next report.

Little changed between then and last week, when Manuel accepted the BTT's latest recommendations for the motor industry. The only rider is that a working group has been given the chance to smooth some of the plan's rough edges before its scheduled implementation on September 1.

But the plan contains positive elements. Protection for vehicles and components will diminish, exports will be encouraged, and there will be a degree of local model rationalisation, indeed, the process has already started and companies are starting to import low-volume models previously built here. The growing number of foreign makes being seen on the SA market is a sure sign that the market is opening up.

Delta Motor Corp MD Willie van Wyk, whose company builds Opel and Isuzu vehicles, says past local content programmes have isolated the SA motor industry from the global market and created an inefficiency in the local market. The new policy will help correct this in a regulated manner.

VW MD Heinrich Holtmann says the new programme will put pressure on all sectors of the industry to become more productive in order to compete on world markets. On the other hand, he is worried that the small vehicle incentive, offering duty rebates to makers of small cars, may disappear after three years.

Already gone, though, are some of the toughest actions from the original task group report: a sure sign that the final programme is motivated by different objectives than those originally visualised by Keys and Riley.

As Riley explains it, his mandate was to encourage local vehicle manufacturing, and not just assembly. Rather than an industry which bolted together components created around the world, the aim was to create an industry in which as much as possible was manufactured locally. That meant a strong components sector enjoying long, cost-effective production runs. That, in turn, meant fewer vehicle models in greater numbers.

Of course, a hardline programme could have unpleasant social and political results. Australia, which adopted a tougher approach to its motor industry's similar problems, has seen manufacturers close plants with the loss of thousands of jobs. On the positive side, the surviving "rump" is more efficient and competitive than it's ever been.

Given SA's sensitive labour situation, the possibility of significant job losses was a risk which Manuel and the BTT were always unlikely to take. In their lobbying, vehicle manufacturers have stressed the point that their plants - and the components and service industries that have sprung up to support them - are the main economic centres in some regions, and that these would be devastated by factory closures.

And yet, as Riley confirms, National Union of Metalworkers (Numsa) representatives on the task group took a long-term view of proposals to restructure the industry. They accepted that jobs could be sacrificed in the short term to generate long-term growth.

The view was supported this week by Numsa general secretary Enoch Godongwana, who says the creation of a viable, export-oriented industry requires "more than simply reducing the protection provided the industry." He regrets the lack of clear direction on reducing model numbers and says the Manuel plan will not guarantee long-term growth in our situation.

John Brandtner, president of the National Association of Automotive Component and Allied Manufacturers (Naacam), agrees: "Unless car manufacturers are encouraged to reduce the variety of locally manufactured or assembled models, we will not see any meaningful improvement in economies of scale and therefore no fundamental moves towards more affordable cars in the short term."

He adds that where affordability does improve, it will mutually be at the upper, imported end of the market where the benefits of reduced tariffs will be felt.

Econometrix's Trieve says that, for most consumers, it will be several years before they enjoy any advantages.

Clothing manufacturers are equally cautious about their plan. Textiles producers may be pleased with the final outcome, but the feeling is certainly not unanimous. Apart from an early phasing down of tariff rates, rather than the 10 years they sought, lobbyists from the Textile Federation have little to complain about.

In terms of the plan, import tariffs on clothing will fall from a current 90% on the import price to 45%, household textiles from 55% to 30%, fabrics from 45% to 22%, yarn from 32% to 15%, and polyester fibres from 47%.

Rejected were proposals by the National Clothing Federation that fibres drop to nil in two years, yarn to nil in four years; fabrics to 15% in five years, and clothing to 40% in 10 years. It argues that because textile manufactures are a basic coat input for the manufacture of garments, their protection should be phased out more quickly, offering clothing manufacturers time to acquire a competitive export footing.

Once again, there seems to be a gap between what government would like to do, and what it does. In his parliamentary budget speech recently, Manuel criticized input suppliers in the SA industrial sector who practice import parity pricing behind high tariff barriers. It is a practice which "has rendered most downstream and, hence, labour-intensive industries uncompetitive. A number of producers of these products have a relationship with downstream suppliers which virtually holds them captive because of high tariffs and because they are virtually monopoly suppliers."

Given the eight-year, limited phase-down of protection for textile companies, those words ring hollow. But the issues in the clothing and textiles business are never simple. Textile spokesmen say their inputs add only between 2% and 9% to retail garment selling prices, while clothing manufacturers are free to make tariff rebate provisions if they want to import textiles for re-export.

The clothing sector also holds itself up as a champion of small business and one whose low-capital, labour-intensive nature is deserving of special treatment under the Reconstruction & Development Programme. But that's hardly an argument on which to base sensible economic planning. Manuel is more likely to have been swayed by the textile sector's proposed R3bn investment plan to upgrade antiquated and globally uncompetitive equipment.

Protected by tariff barriers from the need to upgrade in the past, the sector says it will take years to recapitalize, restructure, and retrain its workforce. Given less protection than that offered under the plan, it might be encouraged to speed up that process and become competitive rather quicker.

Though both sectors have been given a mandate to respond to the Manuel plan, Textile Federation chairman Mervyn King sounds confident of the outcome. We now have enormous confidence in the future of the SA textile industry and the upbeat trend reflected in results reported by textile companies over the past few months will continue and improve further. Shareholders can now look forward to a resumption of the sector on the JSE.

Where clothing and textiles agree is that the future success of any plan is heavily dependent on improving SA's sieve-like customs apparatus "Grey" imports of clothing and textiles are suspected to account for up to 30% of total trade.

Though the two sectors have been at loggerheads since 1989, when a structural adjustment programme was first proposed, it is only more recently that textiles companies have seen their protection flourish. Major tariff increases in 1992 were intended to be on a one-year Band-Aid for aailing textile industry. Three years later, the Band-Aid is still on and facing only gradual removal.

Even with their weaknesses, it would be reassuring to think that both mooted plans, for the motor industry and for textiles and clothing, will signal the end of the uncertainty that has hamstrung the industries for years. But the immediate signs are not promising. As long as they see lack of clear government direction, lobby groups will continue to press for change long after the plans become policy. SA will continue to be endlessly fragile and facing endless future demands in the post-Apartheid era see some previous industry policies into chaos and deterring local and foreign investors.

Government has taken a long time to reach a decision on these two industries. For all the questions hanging over the policies, if they believe them to be the best possible, Manuel and the BTT must stick with them. Half a policy is better than none.
Adonis knits its way to success
Marcia Klein (18)

Adonis Knitwear continued the recovery evident at the September year-end to report a leap in earnings to 20.7c (1.7c) a share in the six months to March.

The company manufactures exclusive men's knitwear under its own Adonis, Dino Milano and Paul D'Orsay labels and under licence to Pierre Cardin and Lyle & Scott.

Turnover figures are not given in contravention of the Companies Act, but turnover grew by 78.1%; compared with a 20.9% growth in the previous year.

Trading income surged to R1.3m compared with R31 000 in 1994. After an increase in net interest income, net trading income was R1.3m from R41 000 previously.

Directors said this increase reflected "the marked increase in turnover and the controlled growth of costs maintained at a level well below the increase in turnover".

After taxation of R562 000, net attributable income was R322 000 compared with R80 000 in the previous year. An interim dividend of 6c a share was declared.

Recently chairman John Bencen said the order book was full and capital expenditure of R3.2m was earmarked for the current year.
Submissions for tariff plan

The Clothing Federation planned to submit counter-proposals on July 11 to the tariff phase-down period announced recently by Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel.

The federation would formulate the proposals tomorrow at a council meeting in Johannesburg.

The federation's executive director Hennek van Zyl said the clothing industry was disappointed that Manuel had given in to pressure from labour and textile firms.

"Our members will take a strong stand against the tariff proposals. What was supposed to be a two-year band aid for the textile industry has become a 10-year band aid," he said.

Van Zyl said Manuel's decision was short-sighted and did not take job-creation into account.
Re-rating of clothing sector of JSE expected

Yuri Thumbren

A RE-RATING in the clothing, footwear and textiles sector of the JSE should come about this year after tariff uncertainties were resolved with Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel’s long-term plan for the industries, market sources said.

Despite the outcry from clothing firms over Manuel’s “long” eight-year tariff phase-down, analysts believe clothing shares, and in particular Scardel, would benefit from a re-rating of the sector.

The clothing, footwear and textiles index closed at 1 289.7, just off its high of 1 329.86 reached earlier this month.

Another share expected to benefit is Rex Trueform. This company has a good export market for its products, mainly for men’s suits and fashionwear.

Apart from its substantial clothing interests, Scardel, through Searreg, controls SA’s largest textile manufacturer, the Frame group.

An analyst said the sector was geared for real earnings growth, contradicting the market’s present low opinion of it.

Another analyst said the earlier negative perceptions of the textile and clothing industries had been justified, as the outlook had not been clear. But now that there was certainty, he was dismayed at the lack of interest among investors.

Textile Federation executive director Brian Brink said the industry would formulate plans to inform investors and decision makers of the road ahead.

Romatex MD Mike Hankinson said the increase in maximum specific duties by 5% a year, which would be discontinued in five years, ensured encouragement for manufacturers producing high value added or specialist textiles and clothing.
Coastal Clothing posts a heavy loss

Nicola Jonvey (30/6/95)

DURBAN — Clothing company Coastal Clothing Manufacturers, which was suspended from the Johannesburg Stock Exchange until April 30, posted a R3,400m loss for the year to February, the directors announced yesterday.

The company was restructured and re-capitalised subsequent to its year-end. It did not trade during the year under review and no dividends were declared or paid.

A misunderstanding which had meant Coastal Clothing had not submitted its results to the JSE within three months of its year-end had been resolved, and the company no longer faced a further suspension for late submission.

JSE listings director Ernest Matthewson explained yesterday that the results were received at the beginning of the week and that Coastal Clothing had met the extended deadline.

By February 1994 the company had had a turnover of R67m and operating loss before interest, taxation and extraordinary items of R3,4m. Accumulated loss by the end of that financial year was R3,400m.
Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel ... introducing tariff cuts in the auto, textile and clothing sectors.

Tariff cuts will help economic growth

By Moeletsi Mbeki

Ways must be found to encourage saving and increase skills

The government is at present, probably the only ANC majority that is seriously trying to do what the blacks who voted for the ANC want to see done as a priority. In their heart of hearts, must black voters want to see the easing of government control over the white man, especially over the white man who has been trying to do what they want.

Tariff cuts will just do that. They will raise wages, bring down prices, and so on. They will also encourage people to save and invest in industry, and reduce the power of the rich over the poor.

Whether tariff cuts will punish the white man and punish him sufficiently, as a matter that should exercise our great legal minds to the man in the street, however, is a moot point. Whatever the virtues of free trade in cars, textiles and clothing as a way of bringing about economic development in South Africa, tariff cuts mean that less protection of these industries means first and foremost more pain for their white owners and managers.

For instance, they will, by taking a share of the market, hit the owners and their highly paid white managers where it hurts most - their pocketbooks. Imports will, of course, also adversely affect black workers in these industries. However, in the eyes of most black voters, that is a necessary price for the greater satisfaction of seeing whites suffer.

An iron law

Sanctions, after all, taught today's black electorate, the former oppressed masses, that there is an iron law which states that one must sacrifice to achieve the community's higher objectives. This message is beginning to register even with the pro-ANC unions in the motor, clothing and textile sectors.

Unfortunately, important as they are in the country's body politic, are beginning to learn the other iron law about democracy - that when it comes to influencing Government decision-making, it is the wealthy of the broad electorate that carry more weight.

This means that those who are trying to oppose Manuel's tariff-cutting spree are invariably going to fail because they cannot mobilize a larger constituency in favour of greater protection than theconstituency Manuel lists behind him which supports reduced tariff protection.

But what about the economic aspects of Manuelaism? Will South Africa achieve economic growth and therefore full employment through free trade? To answer that satisfactorily, we need to look closer into the mechanisms that affect South Africa's industrialisation process.

It is because of its flawed industrialisation process that South Africa is today on the one hand unable to create meaningful employment for most of its citizens and, on the other, a producer of more expensive clothing, shoes and cars than many other countries.

Tackling root causes

If we do not tackle the root causes that have led to half of this country's labour force being unable to find jobs, no amount of cheaper imports will save South Africa from the increasing unemployment of the majority of its people. For the country to create more jobs that pay better, a higher rate of industrialisation is required than what we have at present. However, two challenges face those, including Manuel, who want to speed up the country's industrialisation. The first is to encourage saving and the second is to develop skills that will create the opportunities for these savings to be invested in broadening and deepening the industrialisation process. Tariff cuts have to be combined with these two measures if they are to lead to the further industrialisation of South Africa. On their own, tariff cuts will merely turn South Africa into a nation of importers.

If we define savings as foregoing consumption and therefore immediate gratification in order to be able to consume more in the future, it is clear that this is not a comfortable option. Most people would rather consume now and therefore not save at all. This is why saving by and large is not undertaken voluntarily but is forced either directly, for example through low wages and poor working conditions or indirectly through the creation of a social and economic environment of uncertainty which compels people to save for "a rainy day." The first challenge then is to decide who should be made to save the most and how to make that person or group of persons save.

Industrialisation is therefore first and foremost about the exercise of political power because obviously it was the whites who had the political power, that were able to save the most. In South Africa, historically these were the blacks. Not any more! Today blacks have the vote and are organised into powerful unions that are fighting against the low wages of old.

If we are to raise South Africa's level of industrialisation so that the country's economy employs more people and pays better, who is to be made to save today? This is the question that has to be answered by trade liberalisation and tariff reductions.

In future it is not possible, for instance, to force black collar workers to save as much as the past and then industrialise the country further. Manuel will have to look at facing the well-off classes to consume less and save more.

The yawning gap

A policy that will force the well-off to save and invest rather than encouraging them to consume lavishly, will narrow the yawning gap between rich and poor which could ruin South Africa apart from the not too distant future.

Manuel deserves praise for having the courage to take on the tycoons in the clothing, textile and motor industries. The tasks facing him are even bigger. He has to face down many sections of the well-off, both black and white. If South Africa is to avoid getting locked into decades of grinding poverty and stagnating economy, the lesson is clear: South Africans who lived in exile learnt that it is incredibly easy to destroy a country's economy with misdirected, timid and therefore never working economic policies - with catastrophic consequences for everyone's welfare.

The price is right if the value is real

By ANDY ANDREWS

TRADE and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel’s proposal to restructure the motor, textile and clothing industries is getting SA business on to the right track and into the right state of mind.

The companies in these industries who will prosper will be those who face reality and acquire skills and knowledge to manage the most proactive way. They will recognise that the rules have changed and begin “training” and preparations for the new game that will emerge after the transition.

These companies that will wither and decline will see the restructuring as a problem and a threat and not as an opportunity. They will look back longingly at yesterday, when “value” was determined by protective tariffs and “orderly marketing”.

There is no doubt that we are all in the middle of the “value decade”. All of us want more value. We want more value for the money we spend, we want more value from our government leaders and we want more value from our local services like the police and local government.

What does “value” mean?

For a start, in many markets and industries it means increasing pressure on price for a start. Customers will call for and eventually demand better prices.

They may not want all the bells, whistles and frills that marketers add to their products in a desperate and often futile drive to differentiate their products. Desperate because their market shares are falling and futile because customers are not prepared to pay for features that are really not required. How many of us are frustrated and irritated by the fact that one seems to need a course to operate a video recorder because it has become too complex?

Customers want quality but they relate quality to price — and it is this combination of price and quality that determines value.

All over the world companies in almost every industry have been increasing capacity and globally there is an excess capacity overhang.

In previous decades, global excess capacity was not a threat — but today it is an enormous threat to local companies. The new, more efficient and low-cost distribution systems and the reduction of trade barriers means that almost everybody has access to everything. In South Africa we have seen fresh meat being imported from Australia and New Zealand and chicken from Europe. Our exports must also deliver “value” as the fishing industry is discovering with the European Economic Concession’s Consumer Protection system. We will deliver more “quality” at the same price or face the prospect of losing an export market of R450-million a year.

We can illustrate the relationship between price and quality by using a “value map” as follows.

Research has shown that relative perceived quality (which is defined as your served market’s perception of your quality relative to the offerings of your competitors) and profitability are strongly related. Whether you measure return on sales or return on investment, businesses with higher relative perceived quality and better prices beat their competitors hands down.

The higher value players have:
- stronger brand loyalty,
- higher repeat purchase rates,
- less vulnerability to price wars,
- the ability to generate higher margins,
- lower marketing cost and
- tend to gain market share.

The value map above shows that customers tend to align products along a “comparable quality for price” line so that each competing product provides the same value. Most products will fall along the diagonal line that stretches from the “commodity/economy” end to the “premium” products. But there are businesses that often, by accident or design, end up providing no price premium for relatively low value products.

The dangers of the “poor value” business should be obvious. They offer “poor value” and can’t understand why they begin losing market share.

Their capacity utilisation falls, and profitability declines as fixed costs are spread over fewer units of output. What is the user’s response? Typically they increase advertising and promotional spending instead of addressing their “value” position and get into an accelerating profit decline.

SA companies must understand their “value position” if they are to survive in the global market. Aggressive international players are offering better value and simply increasing advertising spend will not solve the long-term problem of “poor value”.

SA warns Zimbabwe on trade war

BY EMELIA SITHOLE

Victoria Falls — South Africa has cautioned Zimbabwe against retaliatory tariffs in response to Pretoria's punitive duties on textile and clothing imports.

South Africa's high commissioner to Zimbabwe, Kingsley Mamabolo, told a conference of Zimbabwean business leaders on Friday that private industries from the two countries should instead press their governments to reach an early trade pact.

"On the issue of lowering import tariffs by South Africa, despite the anger on the part of Zimbabwe, it would not be advisable to call for a retaliatory tariff regime," he said.

"It will end up in a long, drawn-out process of tariffs and counter tariffs," he told the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries. "We need to find a way forward."

"It would also help the governments if business organisations here and in South Africa — took up the issue. In that way we will be able to put pressure on the governments to take the necessary decisions on lifting tariffs.

"We are inevitably bound towards trading with each other and not fighting each other," he said.

Mamabolo's remarks followed calls by several Zimbabwean business leaders for retaliatory measures against South Africa which tripled the import duty on Zimbabwean textiles and clothing to more than 90 percent three years ago.

The increase was after the expiry of a 1964 preferential trade agreement between the two countries which has, in turn, led to the collapse of a number of Zimbabwean companies which depended on exporting to South Africa.

The chief executive of clothing retailer Truworths of Zimbabwe, Jonee Blanchfield, urged Harare to adopt a "counter strategy" if a new trade agreement was not reached soon.

"If South Africans do not want a trade war, then there must be a compromise," she said.

The Zimbabwean minister of industry and commerce, Herbert Murewa, told the conference that his government would soon take measures to protect the country's industry from South Africa's "unfair trading advantage"
Clothing group employees are learning interdependence

BY FRANCOISE BOTHA

Retail group Sales House has launched an in-house upliftment programme to instil a healthy work ethic and to develop employees' sense of pride and responsibility.

The initiative, which the group has termed Bambanani (a Zulu phrase meaning, I need you and you need me), will be introduced in all Sales House stores this month and will run until 27 April next year to coincide with Freedom Day.

Sabrina Loake, the company's chain promotions manager, said: "We believe that Bambanani will create an active interest in the development and growth of the Sales House chain. The programme is also aimed at creating a sense of purpose and responsibility within our workforce. We aim to instil a sense of pride and unlock the power within our employees to make change happen."

The initiative follows the successful Share project that the group has been running for more than two years and which has improved employees' communication skills and ability to solve problems.

"The Bambanani programme is based on the same nation-building philosophy as President Mandela's Masakhane initiative and it is the ideal vehicle to help refocus the energies within the organisation," said Loake.
Textiles tariff feud to end on Friday

The long standing feud between South Africa's clothing industry and textile industry is due to end on Friday when they are expected to finally accept a decision by Trevor Manuel, the minister of trade and industry that protective import duties should be reduced over eight years.

A final discussion will be held in Pretoria on Friday. The National Clothing Federation has pressed for the more rapid lifting of duties on imported textiles to increase competition. But the Textile Federation has fought for protection to safeguard jobs against competition from countries with low labour costs.

Brian Bank, director of Textile, Aaron Searle, executive chairman of Searle and a former clothing federation president, and Henrie van Zyl, director of the federation, said yesterday they would welcome certainty about the future — Audrey d'Angelo

Proposed cuts in clothing and textile tariffs accepted

Tim Cohen (84)

CAPE TOWN — Responses to proposals by the trade and industry department to slash tariffs in the clothing and textile industries reflected a general acceptance of the plans, a department source said yesterday. Yesterday was the closing date for responses to the plans, which were announced a month ago by Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel.

It is understood that only few responses were received. One of the major issues reflected by the responses was the need for "effective and highly visible" measures to be introduced to reduce "massive seepage" in the industry.

One respondent estimated that tariffs were not paid on up to 50% of imported clothing and textiles entering the country.

But in general, the responses reflected an acceptance of the new tariff structure, which would result in ad valorem rates being phased down over eight years and specific duties phased down over four years with a possible one-year extension in the clothing and textile industries.

The reductions proposed by Manuel, a month ago, are substantially sharper than those accepted in SA's GATT offer, which envisaged a 12-year phase-down period.

Manuel proposed that tariffs on clothing be reduced from 50% to 49% while household textiles be reduced from 55% to 30% and fabrics from 45% to 22%.

Trade union representatives of the clothing and textile sectors are scheduled to meet officials of the department today.
Rolling in dough

The country's major bakers have been accused again of operating a cartel in the R3.4bn-a-year industry.

Pick 'n Pay deputy MD Sean Summers says it "cannot be put down to mere chance" that all major baking groups simultaneously announced a 7c price increase on an 800 g loaf of "government bread" from the beginning of July.

The baking and milling industries were officially deregulated in 1991, and the existence of about 3 000 in-store bakeries, with about 15% of the market, and 174 plant bakeries give consumers some choice.

However, Premier Foods chairman and CE Gordon Utan, says while regular industry "cost meetings" still take place, there is no question of a cartel. His explanation: "Due to the tight level of competition, when one group increases its price, the news travels fast and all the major groups tend to move in sync."

A 1994 Competition Board investigation found no evidence of a cartel or of collusion, "especially as there is competition from the new inhouse bakeries."

Summers says his company is outraged that the bakers, without any consultation, have acted in concert. "They have all cited increases in the cost of labour and packaging as reasons for the increase."

"But it is surely more than a coincidence that they all need to increase on the same day, by the exact same amount, for the same reasons. There hasn't even been a flour price increase to precipitate this increase."

Summers says Pick 'n Pay objected "in the strongest possible terms" to the increase and the way it was implemented.

"In the past, we have been able to negotiate either an extension of the increase, or special bulk deals on new increases, to help the consumer."

"This time, not one of the bakers is willing to negotiate. In a new and transparent society, it is indeed a shame that collusion of this nature can still be said to be in existence."
Textile tariff
poser on the line

FINALLY on phasing down for the clothing and textile industries tariffs is expected at a meeting between trade and industry minister Trevor Manuel and labour on Thursday.

Clarity had been expected this week but the SA Clothing and Textile Workers Union was still locked in deliberation over the minister's June 12 proposals during a two-day meeting in Pretoria which continued until late yesterday.

The union is believed to have reservations about supply-side measures, particularly training and social aspects.

Textile Federation director Brian Brink said yesterday: "It's still in the melting pot. We'd like finality and some clarity and certainty either way." HRG 15/7/95

Clothing Federation executive director Henne van Zyl said yesterday that it was keen to have the tariff issue resolved but "not at all costs."

Clofed president Sadek Vahed renewed a plea for Duty Credit Certification (DCC) export incentives on the value added portion of garments produced with imported fabric.

Major US companies could send exclusive fabric to South Africa to be returned in garment form.

Potential clients were talking about 30,000 or 50,000 garments in a single order. Factories can run a style in three, four or five months producing one item such orders are numerous."

The DCC incentives were the magic formula to create "many, many thousands of jobs" and earn foreign exchange."

"That is the route to become globally competitive. It can't happen overnight."
Imports a threat to SA fabrics

By SHELDON JONES

Statistics from the Textile Federation highlight the increasing threat posed by cheap imports of fabrics via loopholes in South Africa's controversial tariff structure.

In its economic review for this year and last year, the federation said 33 percent of all cotton yarns imported last year duties paid to the country of origin. 53 percent of man-made staple yarns brought into South Africa last year also entered duty free. At least 61 percent of all woven cotton fabrics and 57 percent of all knitted fabrics also entered South Africa without payment of duty.

These figures are underscored by the revelation that South Africa's fabric trade gave rise to a trade balance deficit of more than R1 billion last year.

According to the federation's breakdown, the value of imports of made-up textiles exceeded the value of exports by R2.6 billion.

Although the value of miscellaneous textiles imports rose by 19 percent and exports increased by 42 percent, a negative trade balance of more than R340 million resulted.

Similarly, while the value of clothing imports rose by 24 percent against a 33 percent increase in exports, import values exceeded export values by almost R58 million.

Total fibre imports saw a 2 percent volume increase and a 17 percent increase in value over the previous year. Last year, fibre exports rose by 38 percent in volume terms and 47 percent in value terms.

Unlike other areas, fibre transactions showed a favourable trade balance of R415 million. In contrast, yarn transactions showed a R18.9 million deficit.

The federation also voiced concern about rising international prices.

According to the federation, buoyant retail sales towards the end of last year could continue into this year.

However, there was also a possibility that inflation, coupled with high employee taxation, would inevitably subdue some of the lively retail activity seen in recent months.
Final talks on textile tariffs

Representatives of the clothing and textile industries, the associated trade unions and officials from the trade and industry department will meet in Pretoria today to give final views on proposals to start the phased reduction of tariff protection barriers.

Trevor Manuel, the trade and industry minister, said he expected the proposals to be accepted.

However, he also anticipated that there would be a demand for the government to step up controls of smuggling operations.

Allwear ups profit to R1,8 million

ALIDE DASNOIS

SCHOOL uniform and menswear group Allwear produced smart results in the six months ended June, more than doubling shareholders' profits to R1,8 million.

Turnover was up 33 percent. Exports were static, chairman Renier van Rooyen said, but domestic turnover rose 41 percent.

Demand for school wear was still high, he said, and the budgeted order book for the rest of the year was already sold out.

Directors expected a "substantial improvement" in results for the full year to December, but the rate of growth in the first half would not be maintained, Mr Van Rooyen warned.

Interest-bearing debt has been slashed from R2 million to R83,000, enabling the group to cut interest payments by 21 percent. But finance charges are expected to rise again in the second half, traditionally a busier period for Allwear.

The group has a tax loss of R4,2 million to be set off against future profits.

■ German textile company Corovin is to invest in a R55 million joint venture with South African group Industryx. A factory being built in Port Elizabeth for the new company, Cordustex, will come on stream in October, manufacturing about 2,000 tons of material a year and creating 25 new jobs in the first phase.

■ Import Corovin products are used by the medical, nappy, quilting, hygiene, furniture and bedding industries.

■ Investment trust Genbel has raised its final dividend 27 percent to 14c, making 26c (21c last year).

Net asset value rose from 99c to 1 043c a share.

Over the year ended June portfolio managers reduced exposure to commodity shares from 56 percent to 40 percent and to mining stocks from 44 percent to 33 percent.

Sappi was the top holding at the year-end, followed by Murray & Roberts and Richemont, and Genbel also strengthened its stake in Investec and Didata.

■ Industrial holding company Hunt Leachars and Hepburn has warned shareholders that profits in the six months to September will be significantly lower than forecast.

Performance from the company's timber holdings and from Robertson's was in line with expectations, but Transvaal Sugar, which had been hit by drought, and Rainbow Chicken, would both report losses at the half year.

The group was negotiating the re-structuring of its timber interests, HL & H directors said.

■ In a separate announcement today, Rainbow Chicken warned that it would report a loss at the half year in September, following competition from imports and the closure of the Hammarsdale processing plants because of labour action.

■ Maxtel (formerly Maxmec Mechanical Seals) re-lists on the Venture Capital Board of the Johannesburg Stock Exchange today, following the sale of its sealing business and the purchase of Talkline, Maxtel Trading and Telular SA.

■ Board of Executors cautioned shareholders that discussions were taking place that could affect the price of shares in the BoE and the BoE Corporation.

Chairman Stephen Jaff was noncommittal about the outlook in his annual statement last year and in the interim report, which, as forecast, showed pre-tax profit down from R2.26m to R1.15m.

The most the directors hoped for was maintained annual earnings this time round, so the result is a big surprise. Second-half pre-tax profit was almost four times the previous year's, at R4.67m (R1.29m). Even by Delswa's standards — and its six-monthly results seem to fluctuate more than most firms — that's remarkable.

The group now commendably discloses money turnover at year-end but there was no indication in the interim results of either the actual or change in (six-month) turnover, further analysis is difficult.

A switch in minority interests, however, from a negative R11,000 to a positive R44,000 suggests a major contributor to the improvement must have been a turnaround at 90%-owned children's wear manufacturer Youngset Organics from a R110,000 loss to a R440,000 profit.

Though liquidity remains reasonable, growth has brought strains. Debtor's are up from R24.1m to R34m, accompanied by a R5.3m rise in the overdraft to R11.8m.

Jaff says the delivery of large contracts towards year-end contributed to this — and to the big gains in second-half turnover and profit. He is not thrilled by proposed tariffs and labour's reaction to suggested labour law changes. Prices of yarns and fabrics have risen "dramatically" in the past six months and it will not be possible to pass them on in full, which will strain "already unacceptable" margins.

Despite the uncertainties, order books are full for the first half of the year and results should at least be maintained.

Delswa has never been a great market favourite. The latest earnings may be double those of the preceding two years but are little more than the previous peak in 1989 — and worth much less in real terms.

This can hardly be considered a long-term growth stock but there could be short-term appreciation, underpinned by the sharp discount to NAV. Pyramid Jaff-Delswa (Jade) owns just over one Delswa for each of its own shares and so looks relatively underpriced at 200c.

"USED CLOTHING TRADE A THREAT TO INDUSTRY"

Illegal imports 'cost jobs'

THE FLOURISHING trade in imported used clothing, much of it shipped in illegally, is jeopardising local jobs, the Clothing Federation of SA says. CLAIRE BISSEKER reports.

TRADE in illegal imports of second-hand clothing is threatenng jobs in the clothing industry, the Clothing Federation of South Africa (Clofed) says — but the authorities deny there is a problem.

The Department of Trade and Industry says imports of used clothing are "strictly controlled" through a permit system.

Clofed director Mr Henne van Zyl, however, claims a "roaring and open trade is taking place."

"Worn clothing is allowed to be imported only by churches and registered welfare organisations for free distribution to the indigent. Only used overcoats, which the department deems a "basic necessity", may be imported for sale. There is limited manufacture of overcoats in the country."

Mr Van Zyl said: "In every city in South Africa you can see bales of imported second-hand clothing sold openly. Abuse seems to be rife and it is taking away growth opportunities and jobs in the local clothing industry."

Clofed claims that for every four units of clothing manufactured in South Africa last year, one item of used clothing was imported.

There are no statistics for illegal imports of clothing into the country, but Mr Van Zyl believes the incidence is increasing.

"Daily reports are being received of an increasing number of containers entering South Africa without legal prescriptions, such as the payment of import duty and the correct declaration of contents, being followed," he said.

Complex

"Some of the reasons for this worsening problem are the existence of a decades-old Southern African Customs Union, with certain members having entered into trade agreements with non-union countries; the lack of adequate border control, and the difficulty in obtaining clear evidence of illegal practices."

"It is also recognised that the current high and complex duty regime serves as a further incentive (for importers) to evade the system."

When approached by Clofed, the Department of Customs and Excise had blamed inadequate control on a critical lack of financial and manpower resources, Mr Van Zyl said.

In a statement, the Department of Trade and Industry said it was monitoring the situation and that the Commercial Crime Unit was investigating cases involving illegal imports of used clothing.

However, the department believed that control measures introduced in 1992 had been successful in reducing imports of used clothing from "the very high figure" of 100 million units in 1992 to about 14.7 million units last year.
Seardel warns public ahead of delisting

BY MAGGIE ROWLEY

Seardel, the Cape-based clothing company, intends unbundling its pyramid structure by delisting its holding company in line with overseas trends.

A warning to shareholders to exercise caution in dealing in shares of either the holding company, Searcron, or the operating company Seardel, was issued today.

The financial director, Arthur Jacobson, confirmed the board was close to finalising proposals for the re-organisation of the group's shareholding structure. He emphasised that this would be subject to JSE and shareholder approval.

If approved, the delisting would result in all the group's equity being held in Seardel, with high and low voting shares.

In recent weeks, the share prices of both Searcron and Seardel have moved up strongly with the holding company no longer trading at a discount. In early June, Searcron was trading at R7.75 and Seardel at around R8.50. Both shares are now at the R9.25 level.

According to market sources, the share prices have moved up in anticipation of excellent results for the financial year to the end of June, which are expected to be released next week. Earnings of as much as R2 a share for Seardel, which would represent a 66 percent improvement on the previous year, are expected in some quarters.

If these above-forecast results were to be achieved, it would mean the share price was about R3 undervalued, analysts said.

At the half-year mark, Seardel revised its forecasts upwards after reporting a 60.6 percent increase in attributable earnings for the six months to end December. Earnings at the share level rose by 37.1 percent to 94c (60c) in spite of the capitalisation award in lieu of dividends in November last year which increased the issued share capital by 522,242 shares.

At the time, Aaron Searl, the chairman, said he expected turnover for the full year to be R1.5 billion instead of the R1.3 billion forecast in the 1994 annual report – with earnings 170c a share and dividends of 34c.

Analysts said Seardel was expected to further benefit from its stake in the Frame Group, which was also expected to report good results shortly.
Demand helps SA Bias to double half-year earnings

BY CHARLOTTE MATHERS
INVESTMENT EDITOR

SA Bias Industries, the country's largest distributor of trimmings and accessories to the clothing and footwear industries, doubled earnings to R5.1 million in the six months to June compared with the same period last year.

Philip Coutts-Trotter, the managing director of SA Bias, said the results reflected a significant rise in demand and the benefits of the restructuring of the past few years.

The results also benefited from comparison with the previous period, which was adversely affected by disruptions around the time of last year's election.

Turnover rose 27 percent to R118.9 million while operating income surged 70 percent to R10.4 million on operating margins of 8.7 percent from 6.3 percent the year before. On earnings of 17.7c (8.8c), the interim dividend was raised to 6.0c from 4.0c.

Besides trimmings, the group's other major activities are supplying components and accessories to a range of industries and making trimmings in Britain for that market as well as exporting to the United States, Canada, Far East, Europe, Israel and Australia.

Coutts-Trotter said export volumes had been growing steadily and there was attractive potential for the group's industrial products in many international markets.

SA Bias is forecasting a rise in earnings of 35 percent for the year. Dividends will rise 45 percent.
Union pays R1,5-m for education

Staff Reporter

SOUTH African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union contributed almost R1.5 million towards the education of members' children last year — and this year the figure will be much higher.

"At no stage does the union claim that we solve the problems of all our members. But we certainly feel that we are making a difference," said Saactwu general-secretary Jabu Ngcobo.

All union members' dependants qualify for assistance from the Saactwu Bursary Fund. The amount applicants get depends on the institution at which they intend studying.

Last year, about 2,000 members' children got help

Mr Ngcobo said the fund had been established by committing a portion of weekly union subscriptions.

During wage negotiations this year, one of Saactwu's major demands was that employers make a contribution to the "general upliftment of skills in our society."

The demand was "fairly well received", said Mr Ngcobo.

In the clothing industry, employers agreed to contribute 20c a worker a week towards topping up the fund.

"Many employers in the textile and leather industries have also agreed to these contributions," he said.

"Because education costs are still so high we are mindful of the fact that the level of assistance we extend to applicants is miniscule. But we believe that for under-privileged students, every little bit of assistance does, in fact, count."

"Our vision is, in the foreseeable future, to ensure that our bursary fund becomes even stronger," said Mr Ngcobo.
Seardel warns public ahead of delisting

BY MAGGIE ROWLEY

Seardel, the Cape-based clothing company, intends "unbundling its pyramid by delisting its holding company in line with overseas trends."

A warning to shareholders to exercise caution in dealing in shares of either the holding company, Searcon, or the operating company Seardel, was issued today.

"The financial director, Arthur Jacobson, confirmed the board was close to finalising proposals for the re-organisation of the group's shareholding structure. He emphasised this would be subject to JSE and shareholders approval."

If approved, the delisting would result in all the group's equity being held in Seardel, with high and low voting shares.

Earnings of as much as R2 a share for Seardel, which would represent a 66% improvement on the previous year, are expected in some quarters.

If these above-forecast results were to be achieved, it would mean the share price was about R3 undervalued, analysts said.

At the half-way mark, Seardel revised its forecasts upwards after reporting a 60.5 percent increase in attributable earnings for the six months to end December. Earnings at the share level rose by 57.1% to 84c (60c), in spite of the capitalisation award in lieu of dividends in November last year which increased the issued share capital by 592 242 shares.
Seven-year textile tariff phase-down

Yuri Thumbtane

GOVERNMENT would implement the long-term plan for the clothing and textile industries from September 1, resulting effectively in a seven-year tariff phase-down period.

This is one year less than announced by Trade and Industry Minister Trevor Manuel in June, and has been hailed as a victory for the clothing industry by market sources.

Key elements of Manuel's original proposals were, however, retained in the final plan released last night.

This includes the phasing out of the duty credit certificate scheme over three years, and the phasing out of minimum specific tariffs over four years, with a possible one-year extension. Maximum specific duties would remain the same before being removed in four years and financed by the Industrial Development Corporation (IDC) for the upgrading of technology retained.

Except for the IDC finance package, the R5m annual subsidisation of a management consultancy and training were the only other supply-side measure recommended by the Swart panel to be accepted.

In terms of rebates, the clothing industry would have duty-free access to textiles for re-export under section 470.03 of the Customs and Excise Act. All other rebates would be phased out in eight years' time.

Although the decision was welcomed by the Textile Federation (Texfod), a suggestion by the SA clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) to implement the phase-down only once supply-side measures were finalised was overruled.

But the trade and industry department accepted a Sactwu proposal to form a working committee to pursue supply-side measures. The committee would be appointed shortly.

The DTI informed both industries and Sactwu yesterday that the tariffs would be phased down in line with Manuel's suggestion. This means tariffs on clothing will be reduced from 40% to 40%.

The clothing industry asked for an end rate of 45% but the government was not receptive.

On household textiles the rate would continue over the shortest possible period.

The DTI said it was not possible to meet all the respective needs.

Texted president Mervyn King said the package was practical, reasonable and workable, but deputy president Mike Harrison expressed disappointment at the failure to present supply-side measures.

The Clothing Federation had a conference last night to discuss the final plan before responding today.

Union, Taiwanese consul-general may hold talks

THE Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) has called for a meeting with the Taiwanese consul-general to discuss disputes with Taiwanese employers over wages as well as the recognition of the union.

The union said wages in these areas were as low as R40 a week compared to industrial council rates of around R300 a week.

Union demands to Taiwanese employers include an across-the-board increase of R25 a week.

The Taiwanese consul-general Gary Lin said it was untrue that wages were as low as R40 a week.

He said the cultures of both countries were very different, with Taiwanese employers having to come to terms with high levels of expectation while in Taiwan workers were paid according to merit.

Lin said he did not object to workers getting a reasonable wage as long as they "worked nicely".

He said the unions had to consider the real situation in the country — high levels of taxation, low productivity, a non-existent work ethic and very high transport costs — which did not create an incentive for manufacturing companies to come to SA.
Scardel adopts ADR programme

by Maggie Rawson

Scardel, the Cape clothing company, is the latest South African company to introduce itself to the American investment community by embarking on an American Depository Receipt (ADR) programme.

Sponsored by Bankers Trust, an ADR depository bank in the United States, Scardel’s level-one ADRs will be listed on the Nasdaq index within a few weeks, said Aaron Searle, the chairman of Scardel.

Level-one ADRs are undated securities that trade in the over-the-counter market and provide non-American investors with a simple and favourable means of diversifying their shareholder base, increasing liquidity and reducing volatility of the underlying shares through the development of a trading market outside the home market.

They are also an important stepping stone for a South African company which wishes to expand its operations into the American market in the near future as the disclosure mechanism required by the ADR system, which includes annual reports of foreign companies being made freely available, gives potential American investors a chance to get to know the company.

A lot of South African companies have been going this base-level route to get known in the American market before considering upgrading to a listed ADR to enable them to raise capital through a public offering.

A total of 35 South African companies have become sponsored level-one ADRs within the past two years.
Manufacturers agree to state trade policy

DURBAN. - Garment manufacturers have given qualified approval to the Government programme to bring trade policy for the sector in line with international requirements.

Clothing Federation of SA president Sadek Vahed says the four-year phasing out of minimum specific duties will help curb prices of apparel for people less well-off by keeping down the production costs of smaller manufacturers.

On the drawback side, he says his organisation will continue “at the highest” level to try to persuade the authorities to reverse the decision not to include “value added” (manufactured) goods under the duty credit certificate (DCC) export promotion system.

He said in response to Minister of Trade and Industry Trevor Manuel’s release last week of the long-term plan for the sector that this was the industry’s biggest disappointment.

Failure to extend the DCC system would keep South African apparel makers out of the growing “offshore contracting” business, where retailers and manufacturers in one country supplied fabric to producers in another to make into clothing and re-export to the country where the cloth originated.

This area of trade was expanding rapidly and held out the promise of job-creation, as well as foreign currency earning.

It cost the country nothing in tax terms, while no proof existed the DCC system contravened the World Trade Organisation’s General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (Gatt).

Mr Manuel said DCC would be phased out over three years from September 1.
Analysts expect high Wooltru earnings rise

BY CHARLOTTE MATHEWS

Market expectations of year-end results from Wooltru, due later this week, are high, with analysts forecasting earnings a share growth of between 41 and 50 percent.

Analysts said the group was likely to reap the benefits of the successful introduction of the Woolworths private-label card, overseas expansion and correct positioning.

There are now believed to be about 700,000 to 800,000 Woolworths credit card holders.

According to one analyst, this had enabled the group to grow its business by up to 40 percent. It had also taken credit off the company's balance sheet, without any of the associated banking costs.

There had been some problems with bad debts on the Woolworths card, an analyst added, although this had not been Woolworths' problem but the banks'.

Both Woolworths and SRG were likely to achieve their budgeted margins of 10 percent and 15 percent respectively, an analyst said, although sales and margins at Massmart, which includes Makro and Dan, had been under pressure.

Massmart had budgeted operating margins of 4 percent.

An analyst added that Woolworths in particular had had a lot of scope to improve its operating margins which were below those of its competitor, Edgars.

Australian

Among the overseas operations, the Sportsgirl/Sportscraft fashion chain in Australia acquired by SRG is expected to contribute to earnings only in the 1996 financial year.

Wooltru is expanding in the Middle East, while in Africa it is already operating in Kenya and Mauritius and is expected to open stores in Uganda and Senegal.

One analyst felt the shares were a buy and another suggested they were correctly priced and should be held. A third analyst said the retail sector as a whole was becoming more attractive.

Wooltru shares closed unchanged at R23.00 on Friday, where they were close to their year's high of R24.25. At their current price-earnings ratio of 25.9, they are rated above-average for the sector.
Textile plan raises union ire

Yuri Thumbran

THE SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union (Sactwu) has poured cold water on government's long-term plan for the clothing and textile industries, saying government had "sold out the workers". The union said the plan announced last week — which would see tariffs reduced over seven years instead of eight — had ignored Sactwu's request to finalise supply-side measures before phasing down tariffs. Sactwu national negotiator Lionel October said government's plan had sold out workers, who were now severely disadvantaged because of the lack of social adjustment programmes. He also called on government to finalise supply-side measures before proceeding with the phase-down, scheduled to start on September 1.

In view of the shorter period of liberalisation than required under GATT, the sensitivity of trade policy for the clothing and textile industry internationally and the devastating consequences if large numbers of jobs are lost, we believe there is adequate time for SA to finalise the supply-side and social adjustment measures.

In terms of SA's GATT commitments, SA has 12 years to cut its tariffs. October said government had reneged on a promise to start phasing down tariffs only once supply-side measures had been finalised. Sactwu proposed that a committee look at supply-side measures over a period of eight weeks. October noted that the committee had not yet met to discuss the issue. Last week government said the committee would be set up soon.

"It is not sufficient to reduce trade tariffs. It is vital to have active supply-side measures such as investment in training and technological upgrading, new forms of work organisation and the range of other tools set out in the Swart pane plan, and to introduce these measures in conjunction with tariff liberalisation," the union said.

October said the union was concerned about the "complete absence" of a social adjustment programme to help workers adversely affected by restructuring. He said the original plan, released by the Swart panel, contained a comprehensive social adjustment programme including retraining programmes, incentives for companies to reabsorb displaced workers, commitments to reduce job losses; and help for workers in negotiating restructuring at workplace level.

The Clothing Federation welcomed the decision to phase out minimum specific duties over four years and the decision not to increase the maximum specific duties, but said an even quicker tariff phase-down would have been better.
Union warns on reduced tariffs

THE SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union, while welcoming government plans to reduce trade tariffs over eight years, has warned that the clothing industry could suffer in the absence of "supply side policies".

It was "vital to have active supply side measures" such as investment in training and technological improvements and to institute such steps in conjunction with trade tariff reductions.

It said the government should not proceed on an ad hoc manner to try to achieve international competitiveness. — Staff Reporter
Seardel delivers a bonanza

BY MAGGIE ROWLEY

Seardel, the clothing group, has delivered a bonanza to shareholders, reporting an increase in earnings a share just short of 50 percent for the year to end June.

The increase in earnings to 179.5c a share was achieved on a 27.2 percent increase in turnover to R1.5 billion. The increase was aided by the group’s share of the earnings of the Prime group.

While the earnings growth was in line with a revised forecast by Aaron Searl, the chairman, it fell short of expectations of some analysts who had expected earnings to be as high as 200c a share.

Before-tax income of R63.8 million was 47.2 percent higher than the previous year, but a high tax bill curtailed growth in after-tax income to a 44.8 percent improvement at R42.5 million.

Group equity was up 32.4 percent at R271.6 million which helped to contain borrowings and related finance costs. This resulted in the debt/equity ratio improving to 39 percent from 49 percent last year.

A final dividend of 23c will bring the total payout for the year to 35.5c a share — 47.9 percent higher than last year.

However, to improve cash flow and to comply with the government’s wishes for companies to plough back their earnings, a scrap dividend is being proposed in lieu of cash.

Earlier this month the group issued a cautionary to shareholders advising of the possible unbundling and de-listing of Searc, its holding company. Searl said that in the event of these proposals being implemented the company would ensure Searc shareholders would receive their full pro-rata entitlements.
Seardel earnings up 50%, but problems looming

Business Staff

SEARDEL produced a 49.5 percent increase in earnings a share to 179.5c (120.1c) for the year ended June, but warned of a more difficult trading climate in the new financial year.

The clothing manufacturer's turnover increased by 27.2 percent from R1 151.3 million to R1 464.7 million. Operating income rose 30.7 percent from R89.8 million to R139.9 million.

After tax profits, at R42.5 million, were up 44.8 percent on last year's R29.3 million. Attributable income rose 51.8 percent to R42.7 million (R21.1 million).

The group's proportionate share of the substantially improved attributable earnings of the Frame group was accounted for in determining the earnings a share. Attributable earnings of associated companies rose nine-fold from R500 000 to R4.6 million.

A final dividend of 28c (17c) was proposed, bringing total dividend distribution to 36.5c (26c), an increase of 71.9 percent.

The directors proposed the award of capitalisation shares in lieu of a cash dividend with the aim of improving cashflow. Shareholders may however elect to receive a cash dividend in respect of all or part of their shareholding.

In the event of pyramid holding company Seardel Consolidated Holdings (Searecon) being de-listed, a possibility raised in a cautionary notice last week, Searecon shareholders would receive their full pro-rata entitlements, the directors said.

The next financial year was expected to see more difficult trading conditions, with consumer spending probably at a lower level than last year, the Seardel directors said.

The group was encouraged by the broader line being taken by the state against counterfeit violations.

The amount of textile, clothing and electronic imports on which no or incorrect duty was being paid could be as high as 30 percent of all imports.

"Import statistics therefor do not reveal the true picture. This is a serious problem that needs to be addressed as a matter of urgency."

Health and Racquet Club yesterday reported a growth of 22 percent in profit to R6.8 million for the six months ended June, compared with R5.4 million in the same period last year.

Turnover was up 23 percent to R77.5 million (R63.1 million). Earnings a share rose to 8.8c (7.2c).

Joint managing directors Peter Gardener and Rod Mitchell said the growth in turnover could be attributed to the increase in short-term membership sold at existing clubs, as well as to the good performance of new clubs.

"A limited number of five and 10-year subscriptions are sold at developing clubs, while only one-and-two-year memberships are available at operating clubs," they said.

"The prime objective of our existing clubs during the past six months was to retain membership through quality service - this has paid off with an increased renewal in membership."

Mr Mitchell said new developments were well ahead of schedule with six new clubs planned for the rest of 1995.

Three new clubs, at Stellenbosch, Kemilworth and at Westville in KwaZulu/Natal had been opened during the past six months.

A final dividend will be declared in March 1996.

■ Protea Assurance yesterday posted attributable profits of R2.4 million for the first six months of 1995, turning around a R3.3 million loss for the same period last year.

Net premium income rose by nine percent to R317.5 million (R290.9 million).

The group's results hit by the drop in the market value of investments and the underwriting loss of R14 million in the short-term business, although this was an improvement on a loss of R16 million in the first six months of 1994.

Investment income rose by 13 percent to R15.9 million (R14 million).

Protea Assurance managing director Andrew Tantum said high levels of crime continued to impact heavily on the results of short-term insurers.

"It is therefore encouraging to note that business, government and other stakeholders appear resolved to tackle the issue of crime."

He said Protea's own results for the half year suggested that there had been a turnaround as the alarming deterioration experienced last year had been halted.

"We are now benefiting from our investment in information technology and stricter underwriting criteria are being applied to eliminate non-profitable business."

Protea Life had made good progress over the past six months with a 36 percent increase in recurring premium income. Total net premium income increased by 15 percent to R80.1 million (R69.5 million).

■ IBM South Africa Group reported an increase of just over 100 percent in operating profit to R56.6 million for the six months ended June on turnover up 24 percent to R514 million over the same period last year.

Earnings a share rose to 23.6c. The directors postponed consideration of a dividend until October, when non-resident shareholders tax will have been abolished.

Deputy chairman of IBM South Africa Group Brian Meh said pre-tax profit rose to R59.7 million (R25.6 million), reflecting benefits that were beginning to accrue to the group following IBM's acquisition of 51.5 percent controlling interest in ISG in November last year.

The company benefited from higher interest rates and an increased level of local investment to report investment income of R7.1 million (R3.8 million).
Seardel shares deliver bonanza

BY MAGGIE ROWLEY

Seardel, the clothing group, has delivered a bonanza to shareholders, reporting an increase in earnings just short of 50 percent a share for the year to end June.

The increase in earnings to 179.5c a share was achieved on a 27.2 percent increase in turnover to R1.5 billion. The increase was aided by the group's share of the earnings of the Frame group.

While the earnings growth was in line with a revised forecast by Aaron Searl, the chairman, it fell short of expectations of some analysts who had expected earnings to be as high as 200c a share.

Before-tax income of R85.8 million was 47.2 percent higher than the previous year but, a high tax bill curtailed growth in after-tax income to a 44.8 percent improvement at R62.5 million.

Group equity was up 32.4 percent at R571.6 million, which helped to contain borrowings and related finance costs. This resulted in the debt/equity ratio improving to 39 percent from 49 percent last year.

A final dividend of 23c will bring the total payout for the year to 35.5c a share — 47.5 percent higher than last year.

Cash flow

However, with a view to improving cash flow and to comply with government wishes for companies to plough back their earnings, a scrip dividend is being proposed in lieu of cash.

The group issued a cautionary to shareholders this month, advising possible unbundling and delisting of Searcon, its holding company. Searl said in the event of these proposals being implemented, the company would ensure that Searcon shareholders would receive full pro-rata entitlements.
Union wants adjustments before textile plan executed

THE Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union has considered government's decision concerning the strategic plan for restructuring of the clothing and textile industry.

We are in broad agreement with the government proposals for an eight-year period to reduce tariffs to the levels set out in the plan, and note that period as shorter than the period SA is bound to under the terms of GATT. We have two substantial concerns.

Firstly, we are concerned at the lack of adequate supply-side measures, and the complete absence of a social adjustment programme.

In our view, a restructuring of the industry should not be commenced in an ad hoc fashion in order to promote competitiveness it is not sufficient to reduce trade tariffs. It is vital to have active supply-side measures, such as investment in training and technological upgrading, new forms of work organisation and the range of other tools set out in the plan, and to introduce these supply-side measures in conjunction with tariff liberalisation.

The international experience shows that trade liberalisation in the absence of supply-side policies does not lead to increased competitiveness, but rather to job losses and the destruction of large parts of the industry. For a society characterised by levels of unemployment which are higher than most—possibly all—industrialising economies, we cannot afford the further job losses in which a programme lacking adequate supply-side measures will result.

It is our view that tariff reductions should only commence once adequate supply-side measures are finalised.

Secondly, we are concerned at the complete absence of a social adjustment programme, which contains measures to assist workers who will be adversely affected by the restructuring plan. The original plan contains a comprehensive social adjustment programme, including retraining programmes, incentives to reabsorb displaced workers, commitments to reduce job losses, assistance to workers to negotiate the terms of restructuring at workplace level and regional support arrangements.

We do not believe that a programme of trade liberalisation will be justifiable if there are no measures in place to assist workers who will be without jobs through no fault of their own.

In view of the shorter period of liberalisation than required under GATT, the sensitivity on trade policy for the clothing and textile industry internationally, and the devastating consequences if large numbers of jobs are lost in the domestic economy, we believe that there is adequate time available to SA to finalise the supply-side and social measures.

We will therefore, on an urgent basis, continue engaging government in an attempt to dissuade government from proceeding with an ad hoc approach to achieving international competitiveness. We will seek to impress on government the need for a restructuring plan which will build competitiveness rather than destroying industry.

Our support for tariff liberalisation and government's proposed plan is therefore dependent on whether clear supply-side measures and a social adjustment programme is in place.

The result of these discussions will be reported at Sactwu's biennial national congress, scheduled for 21-23 September, at which time a final decision on the plan, and government's response thereto, will be taken.

☐ This is the full text of Sactwu's statement on trade liberalisation published at the weekend.
City woman in Industrial Court row

FRANCOISE BOTHA

IN A MOVE to challenge the Industrial Council agreement governing the clothing industry, a Cape manufacturer will go to court today with the full support of her workers in a bid to save their jobs.

Ms Lena Simpson, who owns a cut, make and trim operation, said that she had received a criminal summons from the Industrial Council for not paying the required levies. She claims that the required payment is not in keeping with the constitution as association is a requirement and not voluntary.

The firm, Cedee Manufacturers, employs 25 workers who have given Ms Simpson their full support in non-payment of the levies.

Salary deductions

She said that the levies required would cost about R3 000 a month. Half of the amount is a deduction from the workers' salaries.

"The girls say they would rather take the money home because they need to feed their families.

"We have to work a lot harder every month just to keep the Industrial Council in business."

Should Ms Simpson be found guilty, the factory will be closed down unless she can pay the amount outstanding.

The old Industrial Council agreement with the clothing manufacturers was extended in terms of the Labour Relations Act until June 30, but no new agreement has replaced it.

A spokesman for the Independent Garment Manufacturers' Association said it was ludicrous someone could be charged under an expired agreement.
CLOTHING & TEXTILES

Seven-year itch

With the ink barely dry on government’s final proposals for a seven-year tariff phase-down for the founding clothing and textile industry sectors, the two protagonists have let fly again. This time, though, most of the ire is directed at government.

textile Federation executive director Brian Brink says tariff adjustments are meaningless without other changes. “We believe the phase-down must be postponed until the necessary supply side measures are devised and implemented. Without these, we will have no strategy and just a seven-year duty phase-down,” he says. Brink’s views are supported by the SA Clothing & Textile Workers’ Union.

But Trade & Industry Minister Trevor Manuel has already indicated that government has no funds for such measures. All that is offered is a R5m-a-year management consultancy subsidy, while a small working group has been appointed to look into other “general” measures.

Brink says supply side measures should include:

- An export incentive package to compensate for the expected abolition of the general export incentive scheme (14%) and the Duty Credit Certificate scheme, which provides a 30% rebate against tariff levies;
- Training support measures, with the State providing 50% of the cost;
- Interest rate subsidies to equalise SA’s high rates with the much lower rates in competitor countries; and
- A social restitution programme to train and assist workers losing their jobs as the industry upgrades itself and reinvests in modern technology.

“These are not handouts but assistance schemes, subjected to the achievement of production and export targets,” says Brink.

National Clothing Federation (NCF) executive director Henne van Zyl says that, while the sector accepts the plan in principle, the NCF lobbied strongly for a much shorter phase-down period for textiles. He also has other reservations.

“We accepted government’s plan in a spirit of compromise, even though our demands were not met. But it would be most unreasonable if government grants yet a further extension,” says Van Zyl. He also criticises government’s failure to control the widespread illegal import of clothing and textiles. He says the problem is growing and that illegal importers are subverting the system.

“This problem has been under discussion for a number of years and yet no improvement seems to have materialised,” he adds. He notes that lax customs controls mean few shipping containers are ever correctly inspected and the flood of illegal imports has not abated.

He wants national industry federations to support, through the SA Chamber of Business, a national campaign to “eliminate this cancer from our economic system.”
Planned tariffs cause alarm

South African clothing and textile manufacturers said they rejected proposals to restore preferential tariffs on imports of clothing and textile products from Zimbabwe from October.

The Textile Federation and Clothing Federation said it was alarmed about the planned reinstatement of the preferential tariffs, announced in Pretoria on Wednesday.

"Zimbabwe has access to raw materials at duty-free prices, its labour rates are 20 percent of South Africa's and it is in close proximity to the South African market. There is no justification to grant Zimbabwe further trade preferences." The federation said the move would see tariffs on Zimbabwean clothing imports, presently at 7 percent, reduced to 15 percent. A complicated structure governs textile imports, but tariffs on cotton fabric imports from Zimbabwe should fall from about 35 percent to 10 percent. — Reuters
Zipped tight

SA clothing manufacturers are being denied access to the fastest-growing segment of the US$14bn-a-year global clothing business — value-added contracting.

National Clothing Federation executive director Henrie van Zyl calls government’s failure to extend the benefits of the Duty Credit Certificate Scheme (DCCS) to the import of material for the manufacture of value-added clothing “a disaster.”

He says that under the recently announced seven-year tariff phase-down plan for the clothing and textile industries this was the “single biggest disappointment” and undermined job-creation potential.

The clothing industry has been identified by Gatt as the trade sector with the biggest global growth potential. Value-added business is one of the fastest-growing sectors.

Offshore or value-added business, over the past few years, increased from 3% to almost 15% of the total turnover of the UK clothing industry, while “outward processing” (or value-added) imports into the European Union (EU) totalled 100 000 t of clothing in 1992.

Local clothing exporters are already at a competitive disadvantage as the General System of Preferences tariff benefits extended to SA by the US and the EU specifically exclude clothing and textile exports. Other developing nations such as Zimbabwe also benefit from the Lomé Accord’s zero-tariff ruling on European imports from African, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) nations — which exclude SA.

These cost hurdles first have to be overcome in order to be able to compete in the cut-throat export market, says Van Zyl. Other beneficiary countries do not have to pay the tariffs levied on SA exporters.

“Offshore (or value-added) contracting is growing rapidly internationally. The method is simple. Overseas retailers or manufacturers supply their own fabric to the SA clothing industry for manufacturing, after which the made-up clothing is re-exported,” explains Van Zyl. But without the cost-cutting benefits of an extended DCCS, “SA will not be included in the global sourcing strategies of major international customers and will therefore fail to secure a part of this rapidly growing segment of international trade.”

Extending DCCS benefits to the value-added clothing business was one of several supply-side measures proposed by the 173-page Swart Panel long-term plan for the industry — and rejected by Trade & Industry Minister Trevor Manuel. “Government has already indicated on previous occasions that the set of supply-side measures as recommended by the panel was not affordable,” says the Department of Trade & Industry.

But while other supply-side measures in the Swart report tallied up to a bill of more than R2bn over 10 years, the DCCS extension would have been relatively cheap — though valuable in terms of potential rewards to the economy.

Van Zyl says implementing the extended scheme would bring no additional cost to the fiscus, nor would it represent an additional subsidy above the duty rebate on imported raw materials.

“By utilising Section 470 03 of the Customs & Excise Act, clothing manufacturers can already import, duty-free, the fabric component of any re-exported garments. But this represents only 50% of the cost of finished clothing items. The Swart Panel suggested that DCCS benefits also cover the balance of labour, distribution and market access costs of any re-exported, value-added clothing items,” he adds.

The existing scheme allows exporters of both clothing and textiles a 30% credit against any future import tariffs, based on the value of exports. This scheme has now been extended by government for the next three years.

Without any additional assistance, which could be provided by an extended scheme, SA manufacturers will not be able to compete in the offshore, value-added clothing re-export market.

The DTI says extending DCCS benefits to value-added items would be difficult to administer and verify. It opposes extending an unsatisfactory verification situation to DCCS scheme administration. “It is not economically sound to address structural deficiencies in the economy that contribute to an anti-export bias via temporary subsidies.”

The DTI adds, “It is up to the clothing industry to rise to this challenge as it has been the beneficiary of a kick-start measure for many years. Depending on the size of value-added operations, however, scheme benefits arising therefrom could create distortions in the domestic market through a surge in duty-rebated imports.”

SA’s leaky customs administration and its lack of proper controls over trade remain major problem areas. But, says Van Zyl, “the administration of an extended DCCS is not insurmountable.”
TEJ profit scheme tailored to fit

By JEREMY WOODS

A PROFIT-sharing scheme believed to be a first in the clothing industry will give the workforce of Cape clothing manufacturer TEJ 10% of the company's pre-tax profits.

"It's not a hand-out as in the past, it's a sharing of the profit based on a set formula everybody understands," says Freda Henry, the company's head shop steward.

"We decided to take the high road to success and vote for the scheme," says Ismail Parker, trim store manager at TEJ's Steenberg factory.

The profit-sharing scheme, called Gainshare, comes into effect when the company's operating profit reaches 10% or more of sales.

Top management is excluded from the scheme, which distributes half of the "gain-share" on a per head basis, and the balance according to employees' weekly basic income.

"That seemed the fairest way of allocating the gain-share pool, and recognising the different income and responsibility levels of all employees," says Tony Owen, managing director of TEJ.

But intense shop-floor interest in the scheme has resulted in hidden benefits for TEJ.

"Suddenly shop-floor operators have become interested in the company's operating profit. They turn off lights, pick up pieces of trim and yarn and don't leave taps running," says Corinne Cooper, a merchandiser at the company.

Five years ago TEJ was on the brink of bankruptcy. Now it is steadily moving back into profitability.

The gain-share scheme forms a key element in the company's overall vision of becoming a competitive, world-class manufacturing business, says Mr Owen.
Re-educating workers

Trade tariff liberalisation should go hand in hand with retraining and re-education of workers in textiles, says Andre Kriel, national education officer of Sactwu.

Without the necessary precautions, restructuring of the clothing and textile industry will add to the number of unemployed people in South Africa.

liberalisation in the absence of adequate supply side measures and a social adjustment programme has often been incorrectly confused as protectionism against international competition.

Further, manufacturers hiding behind the guaranteed profits of protection are able to keep prices high and quality low. In this way, our members and other consumers receive poor-quality, high-priced goods.

In short, protection will lead to an industry which becomes more backward, producing shoddy articles, and with a world applying pressure on us to open our economy. When we do open the economy, most factories will then be forced to shut down, since they are so inefficient compared to the rest of the world.

That leaves the option of improved efficiency. Efficiency can only be improved through major restructuring of industries and factories.

In the short term, this may have negative effects on workers, with the painful process of adjusting to the needs of efficient production. It may involve changes to work practices, new technology and a decision not to compete on certain product lines.

In the medium to long term, efficiency is the best guarantee of job security, and the best provider of high wages and quality goods at affordable prices. Efficient enterprises require less protection than inefficient ones, and accordingly, less tariff protection is necessary.

At the same time, we argue that lower levels of tariff protection would lead to more government programmes to address inefficiency, will not lead to greater efficiency — only to fewer factories and fewer jobs.

This needs to be done in conjunction with adequate social adjustment programmes to assist workers displaced as a consequence of industrial restructuring.

The “big bang” approach to trade liberalisation (the immediate freeing of markets which would allow capital, labour and other resources to flow to the areas where they can be most productively used) is in practice not so clear, nor so simple. It has in practice not necessarily resulted in faster and more sustainable economic growth. We prefer the alternative route: a coherent development plan, based on market realities seeking to marshal resources towards building an efficient, dynamic industry — not ad hoc decision-making.
Clothing, textile industries stake govt over Zimbabwe tariff deal that Zimbabwean textile manufacturers have certain comparative advantages over their SA counterparts. These include lower cost structures, lower wage rates and preferential access to overseas markets under the Lomé Convention.

Says the DTI report: “For various reasons, government supports the promotion and expansion of economic activities and growth in the southern African region. This will ensure value being added within the region rather than in the Far East.”

Details of the new tariff deal are not yet available but Zimbabwe already enjoys a 10% tariff preference (into SA) on its exported fabrics, 15% on clothing and 15% on yarn. As SA raised its tariffs in 1992, Zimbabwe has asked that tariffs applicable to its exports be reduced to pre-1992 levels.

With SA's membership of the SADC now a fait accompli, protectionist lobbies in the two industry sectors may find themselves on shakier ground in going against the Zimbabwe trade deal.

† 13 months * Annualised

As much as the 13 months to March 31 were momentous for SA, they were frustrating and frenetic for Lenco chairman Douglas de Jager. He struck numerous deals for the group but labour and management problems at subsidiary Amalgamated Shoes (Amshoe) ultimately depressed Lenco’s results and some of his ebullience.

The depth of Amshoe’s problems is not easy to ascertain. Industrial disputes led to the closure of the Durban footwear factory and extensive relocation of production lines to other factories. The rift between Lenco’s board and Amshoe former MD Roy Eckstein led to his departure and the rupture of his contract.

Eckstein apparently accepted a restraint of trade agreement when selling his shares to Lenco. Legal action has subsequently ensued. Lenco alleges he is competing with Amshoe in co-operation with the company’s largest customer. Whatever the case, Lenco’s results have been hit hard. The expression “operating profit” became “net profit from continuing operations”.

Though not immediately apparent from the income statement, net operating profit from operations – excluding Amshoe – was R76.1m. That is R1.9m higher than the net operating profit from continuing operations reflected in the accounts. The significance of this is twofold. First, the contribution from all other Lenco activities was 65.5% from R46m in 1994 to R76.1m. Second, Amshoe incurred an operating loss in financial 1995. Had Amshoe’s profitability been anything like normal, Lenco’s operating profit would have been unusually high.

At the time of going to press, De Jager was unable to comment on the legal wrangle between Lenco and Eckstein. The troubles at Amshoe did not, however, curtail De Jager’s enthusiasm for the shoe industry’s longer-term prospects. Investments include 60% of Olympic Footwear for R7.2m, 100% of men’s and ladies’ underwear maker Arwa Consortium for R8m, properties for R17m and 100% of Peteron Plastics, a rigid plastic packaging maker, in Melbourne, Australia, for R15.2m.

Hendler & Hart’s unprofitable operations were closed in December, resulting in a halving of its workforce. It ran profitably in the last two months of the financial year and is expected to make a profit this year.

The clothing division appears well placed to continue to post good results and prospects for the packaging division appear buoyant. “Growth is likely in SA this year along with a gradual, measured expansion of international interests,” says De Jager.

The problem area remains Amshoe. It seems the relationship with its largest customer (it bought more than half of Amshoe’s production) needs to be restored.

if the subsidiary is to regain respectable profitability in the short term. Lenco’s profit forecasts for 1996 remain clouded because of this uncertainty.

Until there is more clarity about Amshoe’s future, the share is difficult to value. On an historical (annualised) basis, the share, at R8 and down from a 12-month high of R13.50, offers a p/e of 13. That may be high if the Amshoe problems are not resolved but a favourable outcome could offer a buying opportunity.

Rex Trueform's margins improve

Edward West

CAPE TOWN — Clothing company Rex Trueform lifted earnings 17.1% to 241.4c a share in the year to end June as the trading environment became more favourable and margins improved.

Turnover increased 19.9% to R192.1m. An increase in margins was reflected in 35% growth in net operating income to R14.6m. Taxation increased to R3.8m (R1.7m), largely because, with the phasing out of the general export incentive scheme, the proportion of exempt income was smaller than in the previous year, said company secretary Alan Hodgkinson. Pre-tax income was 36.9% up at R14m while taxed income was 19.8% higher at R10.2m. Shareholders could opt for a capitalisation award or an 80c (70c) dividend for ordinary and A shares.

The number of shares in issue is to be increased four times.

Each non-voting A ordinary share will be converted to an N share carrying partial voting powers. Ordinary shareholders, including holders of new N shares, may receive three new N shares in lieu of dividends.

African & Overseas Enterprises, which has Rex Trueform as its major operating company, increased earnings 33.9% to 261.4c a share.

Rex Trueform's sales of branded products to specialty retailers had shown improvement over last year's, and export turnover had been maintained at a similar level.
Clothing group ups earnings by 20%

□ Chromecorp doubles after-tax profit

Business Staff

IMPROVED trading conditions and operating efficiencies boosted Rex Trueform Clothing's earnings by 20 percent for the year ended June.

Attributable income increased by 20.02 percent to R10,217 million (R8,513 million). Earnings a share rose 17 percent to 241.4c (206.1c). Shareholders can opt for a capitalisation award or a dividend of 80c (70c).

Turnover improved by 19.9 percent to R192.12 million, with profit before tax 36.9 percent higher at R14.02 million (R10.24 million).

Export turnover remained at the same level as last year, while the sale of branded products to speciality stores showed a strong improvement.

The Queenspark clothing division produced excellent results, with substantial growth in turnover and profitability.

Capital expenditure for the period amounted to R5,197 million.

Holding company African and Overseas Enterprises declared a dividend of 96c a share from improved earnings a share of 361.4c (195.2c).

Hustenburg-based Chromecorp Holdings, the ferrochrome producer listed in May, 1995, more than doubled after-tax profits from R9.4 million to R22.3 million for the six months ended June.

Turnover increased to R182.4 million (R130.3 million).

Chromecorp chairman John Vorster said the results were on track to achieve after-tax profits of R118 million for the full year as forecast in the prospectus.

"Sales revenue and operating profit for the second half of the financial year will be significantly higher than in the first half," he said.

Malaysia's Time Telekom has taken a five percent stake in Plessey Corporation, the Sankorp-owned electronics group that lists on September 27.

Time Telekom is a wholly owned subsidiary of Time Engineering and a member of the Renong group.

Piestel, Plessey Corporation's telecommunications division, was awarded a contract by Time Telekom to project manage the $1.4 billion installation of Malaysia's first all-fibre optic based telecommunications network.

Piestel will oversee the laying of 3,000 km of broad brand optic fibre cable across Malaysia, as well as a submarine cable festoon around the peninsula. The system will include microwave links, domestic satellite earth stations and switching stations.
Better trading conditions helped wholesale company Rex Trueform to increase its earnings a share by 17.1 percent in the year to June 30, to $4,044 (206.1c).

Shareholders will be given the choice of capitalisation shares or a cash dividend of 80c (70c) a share.

Net operating income rose 35 percent to R14,6 million (R10,8 million).

This was achieved on a 20 percent rise in turnover to R182,1 million (R160,2 million), indicating a widening of margins.

Income before tax was up 36.9 percent to R14 million (R10,2 million) but the tax bill rose to R3.7 million (R1.7 million), because the proportion of tax-exempt income was smaller than last year.

This limited the rise in after-tax income to 19.8 percent at R10.2 million (R8.5 million).

Attributable income to ordinary shareholders was R10,2 million (R8.5 million).

The directors said trading conditions continued to improve and "exports have been maintained at a similar level to last year."

The Queenspark retail division "produced excellent results with a substantial growth in turnover and improved profitability."

Alan Hodgkinson, the financial director, told Business Report that uncertainty about export incentives had made it difficult to plan ahead during the year and had prevented the company from expanding its export market.

It was concentrating on its niche export market, mainly in Germany and the United Kingdom.

The directors say they are planning a capital restructuring with the creation of a new class of N ordinary shares and the conversion of A ordinary shares to N shares on the basis of one for one.

Capitalisation

There will then be a capitalisation issue in terms of which every ordinary and N ordinary shareholders will receive three N shares for every N share or ordinary share held.

African and Overseas Enterprises will elect to receive the capitalisation shares instead of a cash dividend if the restructuring is approved.

African and Overseas Enterprises, lifted net operating income 38.9 percent to R16.3 million (R11.6 million) and after-tax income rose to R11.3 million (R8.8 million).

Attributable income was R6.5 million (R4.8 million) Earnings a share were 261.4c (195.2c).

Shareholders will have a choice between a capitalisation share award, if a capital restructuring scheme similar to that of Rex Trueform is approved, or a cash dividend of 95c (80c) a share.
Directors issue cautionary to Coastal Clothing shareholders

Negotiations to transform Durban-based Coastal Clothing into a major clothing manufacturer are far down the track, leading the directors to warn shareholders yesterday to exercise caution when dealing in the share.

The company, which went into provisional liquidation in 1993, was rescued earlier this year by the Indonesian textile company Polysando, which announced a two-point plan in April.

This would involve the acquisition of new premises and state-of-the-art machinery, creating employment and providing sufficient working capital, thereby restoring the company to profitability.

The second phase would be the commissioning of a new high-technology textile mill.

Change

The cautionary notice indicated possible acquisitions and investments by the company, a change of name as well as a new corporate identity. "It is envisaged that the company will be repositioned as one of the major players in the clothing and textile sectors in southern Africa."

Rajen Pillay, the managing director, declined to elaborate on the notice.
Sterling Clothing shows off its mid-year results

Yuri Thumbran

IMPROVED sales following last year's elections benefited men's casual clothing manufacturer Sterling Clothing, which yesterday reported earnings of R1,1m a share for the six months to June compared with a loss of R0,8c in the same period last year.

Turnover rose to R24m from R17,1m and attributable income increased to R218,000 from a previous R155,000 loss. Restructuring and cost-cutting helped to improve margins, with operating income increasing to R1,01m (R488,000).

The interest bill rose slightly to R791,000 (R643,000), while the tax bill came to R86,000 (nil). No dividend was declared, as in the comparable reporting period.

MD Bruno Desmet said the improved performance was directly linked to increases in volumes which had led to higher turnover.

He said the company had benefited from improved demand after the elections. "The market we serve showed a general upturn as consumer confidence improved."

However, chairman Fred Haslett expressed concern over the possible effect of the drought, the possibility of a relaxation of duties on imports from Zimbabwe, and uncertainty in the labour market. He said these factors were cause for concern in the remainder of the year.

Desmet said the Zimbabwe deal, which would be finalised today, would put SA clothing manufacturers at a disadvantage as Zimbabwe enjoyed duty-free access for fabric.

Uncertain future for clothes sector

By Jon Beverley

The clothing industry remains in poor shape for the future, says F N Haslett, the chairman of Sterling Clothing. This is in spite of the improvement in income which saw a R373,000 turnaround from a loss last June to a surplus of R219,000 by the end of this June.

The greatest uncertainty is over the relaxation of duty on imports from Zimbabwe, which came into effect at the weekend, together with the continuing drought and the "ever present uncertainty in the labour market".

The results show a 40 percent improvement in turnover to R24 million and a 108 percent rise in operating income to R1,017 million — a trend that has been ongoing since last year's poor first-half results.

Earnings a share are a modest 1.1c against 1.5c for the whole of last year and a loss of 0.6c for the first half of last year. No forecast is made for the rest of this year.

‘VAT must rise if economy is to grow’

By Audrey d’Angelo

Foreign investors are enthusiastic about South Africa, there is no reason for the economy to slow down and growth of 4 percent or 5 percent is possible, said Brian Kantor, a professor of economics at the University of Cape Town.

In an upbeat address to the annual congress of the Cape Assurance Industry Liaison Committee on Friday, Kantor said consumer spending and exports were rising, capital inflows were good and foreign loans cheaper because the perceived risk factor was lower.

He expected continued stability for the rand.

But it would be essential for VAT to rise and for personal income tax to come down in the next Budget.

Kantor said there was reason for great satisfaction about the healthy state of the economy.

"About 60 percent to 65 percent of the economy is actually consumption spending, and that is growing nicely.”

The formal part of the economy, which was the only part that could be measured, was growing at a rate of 5 percent. But the informal sector was important and it was also growing.

This was shown in the taking up of formerly excess capacity in industry and, this, willingness of manufacturers to invest.

The earnings of the industrial sector of the JSE were 30 percent ahead of last year, after tax.

Kantor said the excellent news was that international capital markets were giving South Africa virtually everything it asked for.

"It comes in a variety of ways, but the most important is in trade credit lines. This is thought of as short-term capital, but in fact it is continually rolled over in trade. It is the best finance you can have — apart from direct investment.”

Companies such as IBM and Ford had returned and others such as McDonald’s were coming for the first time. Foreign companies already here were making capital investments to remain competitive.

Labour act ‘a victory for unions’

By Ross Herbert

The Labour Relations Act was a victory for unions, Sam Shilowa. Cosatu’s secretary general, said on Friday at a press conference, called to counter complaints that Cosatu had "sold out" on key provisions.

Cosatu faced criticism from the Farm and Rural Labour Rights Advocacy Group that the act ignores provisions demanded by agricultural workers. Shilowa said the final bill was far closer to the union’s positions than to those proposed by Business South Africa.

He said the ANC had inserted several union-favourable clauses before the bill was passed in the National Assembly on Wednesday. He said fighting to gain more could have delayed the bill until the next parliamentary session.

He said he regretted failing to win an outright ban on the use of scab labour. Under the final bill, employers can use replacement workers but not for more than 12 weeks.

He said Cosatu would work next year for passage of a mandatory minimum of four weeks severance pay for dismissed workers.

NO SELL OUT Cosatu’s secretary general, Sam Shilowa, denies claims that the union has ‘sold out’ on key provisions of the Act.

Clothing exports’ rise seen as just ‘a temporary surge’

Yuri Thuma

The amendment of the general export incentive scheme (GEIS) has helped the clothing industry to report a 37% jump in exports to R101,2m during the first quarter of the year.

But the Clothing Federation (Clofed) said the jump was seen as a “temporary surge” rather than a significant long-term trend.

Imports on a year-on-year basis were 19% down, falling to R112,3m from the previous period’s R139,6m. Clofed said the slump in imports could have been partly in response to the government’s long-term plan for the clothing and textile industries.

Total clothing output increased by 25% on a year-on-year basis for May, while textiles production rose 18% during the corresponding period a year ago, clothing output rose 22% and textile production 15%.

However, Clofed said that on a month-on-month basis, there were signs that volumes in both industries, especially in textiles, were slowing down.

Clothing production inflation during May was 8% compared with 6% a year ago.

Textile production inflation for May was 11% compared with 4% a year ago. Clofed said textiles represented more than 50% of clothing manufacturers input costs. As the figure was above the inflation rate, this could mean price hikes.
Levi Strauss helps SA charities

By Christine Malherbe

The foundation director of the old company, Susan Maguire, said the foundation's support of the local community sledges aid to local charities and organizations.

Maguire said the foundation's support of the local community helps to build bridges and encourage collaboration between organizations and communities.

She also highlighted the importance of giving back to the community and the positive impact it has on society.

Maguire said the foundation's support of the local community is a reflection of the company's commitment to social responsibility and its desire to make a positive impact in the community.

She also thanked the local organizations and charities for their hard work and dedication to making a difference in the community.

Maguire said the foundation's support of the local community is a small way of giving back to the community and making a positive impact in the lives of those who need it most.
Union critical of IMF presence in SA

Renee Grawitzky

CAPE TOWN — The SA Clothing and Textile Workers’ Union (Sactwu) strongly criticised the involvement of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in Africa and the SA government’s failure to consult the union properly over the Zimbabwe Preferential Trade Agreement in respect of clothing and textiles which comes into effect next month.

Delegates at the union’s congress held in Cape Town at the weekend resolved to reject the IMF’s involvement in SA and criticised the advice being given to the SA government by the IMF.

Delegates also resolved to arrange a meeting with government to discuss the Zimbabwe agreement.

Sactwu general secretary Jabu Ngcobo said delegates had decided that bilateral trade agreements including the Zimbabwe agreement should include a social clause which provided for the protection of worker rights.

Ngcobo expressed his concern about complaints raised by parliamentarians who felt they were merely rubber stamping agreements reached within Nedlac — which could ultimately reduce Nedlac’s power. He said, was the only structure which could bring about peace in the economy.

Addressing the congress, Labour Minister Tito Mboweni said the ministry would focus on the restructuring of the labour department, the formulation of a white paper on an SA Labour Market Policy, the promulgation of legislation dealing with employment equity in the workplace and revision of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act, among others.

Mboweni said he would have to ensure that the revised Basic Conditions of Employment Act included provisions that he promised delegates at Cosatu’s congress last year, including a 40-hour week. He said business has warned him that negotiations on this issue would be very tough.

Delegates at the congress adopted resolutions on a wide range of other issues including the training of officials to gain an understanding of the LRA, centralised bargaining, the restructuring of the clothing and textile industries, training and job grading as well as the appointment of a national organising secretary to co-ordinate specific campaigns.
Coastal Clothing invests $100m in two new plants

DURBAN — Clothing company Coastal Clothing Manufacturers planned to invest $100m (R360m) to create a polyester weaving plant in Gaborone and a manufacturing facility at Hammersdale, creating 4,500 new jobs in a highly depressed industry, MD Rajen Pillay said yesterday.

He said the expansion would include the incorporation of a polyester weaving plant in Gaborone, the creation of a modern printing, dyeing and processing facility at Hammersdale and an international division.

The initial $100m investment for the expansion in Botswana and at Hammersdale would be financed jointly through Coastal Clothing and a bank loan.

The development follows a substantial investment in Coastal by Indonesia-based company Polyaindo last year. Details on the international expansion deal had not been finalised, but Pillay said it would be substantial and grow the company internationally.

"This is the first significant foreign investment coming into the textile industry and is a major boost for a depressed sector."

He said 3,000 new jobs would be created in Botswana and 1,500 at Hammersdale.

The industry would also benefit from improved technology levels, as Coastal would import modern machinery from Japan, Germany and Indonesia.

"Poor technology levels have contributed significantly to the decline in the textile industry over the past few years and an investment of this nature is guaranteed to benefit the overall industry."

The polyester fabric that the company would be manufacturing would replace imports currently entering the country. SA had imported 86-million metres of this particular fabric last year.

Coastal recently acquired the Hammersdale premises of Progress Knitting company.
Seardel expects lower level of consumer spending

From Reuters

Seardel Investment Corporation said it expected earnings of between 188c and 205c a share in the year to June 30 next year, with dividends in the region of 37c to 41c despite an expected slowdown in consumer spending.

The clothing group's earnings were 179,5c and dividends 35,5c in the year to June 30 this year.

In its annual report, chairman Aaron Searl said the forecasts would be reviewed in February because of the difficulty of budgeting in "the volatile South African socio-economic scene".

Searl said he expected the current year to be "rather more difficult, with consumer spending probably at a lower level than last year."

As a result, "strong efforts" would be made to maintain market share, improve pre-tax margins and cash flow, and further reduce borrowings.

He said many of the group's financial ratios and targets had not yet been met and it would continue to review them. It would maintain a prudent dividend cover while issuing capitalisation shares in lieu of dividends.

Searl expressed concern about the proposal to allow Zimbabwe preferential access for its clothing and textiles into the South African market.

"This is perceived as opening a conduit through which textiles, imported duty-free into Zimbabwe, can be processed into finished clothing and exported to South Africa to the detriment of local manufacturers. Local manufacturers have to contend with imports by local textile suppliers, who, in turn, are protected by duties."

"This must be opposed with vigour," Searl said.

He suggested that a way forward could be for Zimbabwe to join the South African Customs Union, but only provided the customs departments of all regional states could adequately apply and police import tariffs.

Ensign battles to break even in ‘shrinking’ market

Edward West

CAPE TOWN — Workwear, uniform and protective clothing manufacturer Ensign yesterday reported a loss equivalent to 122c a share for the six months to end-June and warned that a profit was unlikely for the full year.

Chairman Ronald Roy said the company was battling against a shrinking market in terms of work contracted for, and was unable to find new markets, while margins were extremely tight.

Turnover was 24% up at R17,3m in the interim period, and the operating loss amounted to R247 000 compared with a R1,5m operating loss at year-end.

The interim dividend was passed.

The clothing division continued to suffer losses, which necessitated the raising of additional working capital.

Certain debtors were factored which relieved pressure on borrowings. The Maclean plastic coating division continued to trade profitably.

Roy refused to comment on continuing negotiations with various parties, but said more information would be available by October 31.

He said the R894 000 loss attributable to shareholders in the first six months could be reduced in the second half.
Reex Turferm proposes restructuring of share capital.
CAPE TOWN — Cape-based clothing group Rex Trueform's production lines were fully booked and indications were its factories would be operating at full capacity until June 1996, chairman Stewart Shub said in the annual report.

The expansion of the Queenspark retail division, together with increased consumer demand, was expected to provide a further opportunity for turnover growth, he said.

The company's ranges, including Daks, Lanvin, Marco Azzali, Miss Cassidy, Oggi, Rex Trueform and Wall Street, continued to achieve a high level of acceptance in the trade and had improved market share.

Clothing manufacturing and retail divisions were working capital intensive and over the next few years would need a high level of investment.
Move to crack down on shady clothing imports

Business Editor

PLANS to tighten up customs controls at South Africa's frontiers are to be presented to the cabinet amid an outcry from clothing manufacturers angry at competition from illegal imports.

The office of Deputy Finance Minister Alec Erwin said a plan to restructure the departments of Customs and Excise and Inland Revenue would come before the cabinet on Wednesday. If approved, the plan would be discussed in the departments before being made public on October 26.

A spokeswoman for the deputy minister said it would probably result in an increase in Customs and Excise staff.

Customs and Excise commissioner Daan Coleksi said 300 of his department's 1,700 posts are vacant — and even all the posts were filled, the department would not be able to police the frontiers properly.

"I think in Britain there are about the same number of people just at the two major airports," he said.

The Cape Chamber of Commerce claimed that between 25 percent and 30 percent of imported clothing and textiles either bypassed customs controls completely or were falsely declared.

"Durban is known overseas as the biggest free port in the world," said the Clothing Federation's Bernard Richards.

"And it's getting worse. Illegal imports are prejudicing manufacturers who import legally.

Dr Richards, part of a delegation which met Mr Erwin to discuss the problem, said he was persuaded the deputy minister took the matter seriously.

"But now we need action," he said.

Mr Coleksi said Customs and Excise had confiscated 200 tons of clothing and textiles which had entered the country illegally. The goods had been withdrawn from public auction in the face of pressure from Clofed.

"But the law says we must sell goods which are confiscated, so, if necessary, we will go to the cabinet for permission to sell," he said.
Delay likely for preferential access agreement on textiles

FROM SAPA

Harare — An agreement to allow preferential access of Zimbabwean clothing and textile exports into South Africa is unlikely to come into force before the end of the month as envisaged earlier, Ziana news agency reports.

The chief executive of the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries, Joe Foroma, said last week that South Africa was still studying Zimbabwe’s proposals for preferential treatment of its clothing and textile exports, further delaying the implementation of the agreement.

It was now unlikely the agreement would become effective before the end of October this year, the date agreed to in August.

Foroma, who was part of a Zimbabwean private sector delegation which met representatives of Business South Africa in Johannesburg last week, said the South Africans were still making their own internal consultations on Zimbabwe’s proposals.

“At the moment they have not declined the proposals, although it is unlikely the agreement will come into force by the agreed date,” Foroma said.

The South Africans had in principle offered preferential access of Zimbabwean clothing and textile exports into South Africa at preference rates as close as possible to the situation that prevailed before December 31 1992.

A technical group was to work out the details.

Opposed

South African textile manufacturers are opposed to any deal with Zimbabwe, a situation that has caused the delays, Brian Brunk, the executive director of the South African Textile Federation, said in Johannesburg that the industry in South Africa was generally opposed to any agreement that would result in Zimbabwean textiles and clothing inundating their country.

South African manufacturers argued that their industry was still very young and not yet ready to be exposed to external competition.

A meeting between senior officials of the Zimbabwe Association of Business Organisations (Zabo) and Business South Africa would be held in Harare in early December to try and resolve various issues restricting free trade between the two countries.

Zabo chairman Peter Macsporran said the meeting was a follow-up to a similar one held in Johannesburg on October 2.

Meanwhile, the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries president, Jonah Wakatama, has challenged the private sector to exploit new markets and lessen their dependency on South Africa in light of the current delays in producing a new trade agreement between the two countries.

“The private sector should recognise that South Africa is not the only available market — the rest of the region and the rest of the world need to be explored,” Wakatama said.
Manufacturers, labour welcome IDC's R150m loans boost plan

John Diadyu

SA's vehicle and clothing industries yesterday welcomed plans by the Industrial Development Corporation for a new scheme to assist the country's manufacturers become more competitive.

Sandel-based parastatal IDC said this week it would provide low interest rate loans worth R150m to help industrialists modernise their plants and machinery, reorganise their work methods and boost their productive capacity. The scheme forms part of government's package of supply-side measures.

Pretoria-based SA National Association of Automobile Manufacturers welcomed the measures, as did the National Clothing Federation.

The IDC plan has already been welcomed by labour, represented by the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union.

Labour said it should not be seen as a replacement for a more comprehensive plan of supply-side measures by the state on restructured industries.
A threadbare clothing industry

The local clothing industry is suffering under the weight of imports. Lynda Loxton reports.

The slow growth in clothing sales this year has been blamed on the flood of imported clothing which appears to be escaping custom duties. "The extent of imports that escape customs duty is a very worrying element for both retail and the clothing industry," said Woolworths managing director Sid Muller "If the authorities do not clamp down on this, it is going to cost a lot of jobs in South Africa."

Seardel Investment Corporation chairman Aaron Searl recently suggested that the South African Chamber of Business (Sacob) should provide properly trained inspectors to the Department of Customs and Excise to deal with illegal imports.

While Muller agreed that this was a necessary short-term solution, he said he had "difficulty with these initiatives of privately funding government departments. Personally, I think it is wrong because where do you start drawing the line between the operation of a government department (and) the vested interests of the funder?"

Muller described trading conditions this year as "fairly tough" but said that this had been expected after last year's "phenomenal" sales.

The Woolworths credit card, which has 800 000 signed-up members nationwide, had proved invaluable in keeping sales ticking over but Muller admitted that his staff had been forced to keep a close watch on credit limits because of tough market conditions.

Sales of food and home furnishings were, however, holding up quite well despite growing pressure on consumer spending power.

There have been problems with the illegal manufacture of "character" merchandise such as clothing bearing Disney and Warner Brothers characters. Muller said although police had raided several of the manufacturers involved and confiscated clothing, this was not being done on an ongoing basis.

Also of concern was the "rapid decline in the shopping environment in CBDs" because of the proliferation of hawkers, Muller said. Woolworths had to close its Hillbrow store because trading just became impossible.

Another worry is shoplifting, mainly of clothing owing to its resale value. "We are getting it under control by using new technology and closed circuit TV. We are catching thieves at an alarming rate," Muller said.

Woolworths has embarked on a programme to refurbish its main stores in cities around the country. Food-only stores in Murrayfield and Bryanston and franchises in Brits and Groblersdal will be opened in November.

Outside of South Africa, it is concentrating on stores in the Middle East and Africa. The stores in the Middle East— in Bahrain and Dubai—are proving a challenge as their seasons are different to South Africa's, Muller said.
SEARDEL Investment Corporation, the country's largest clothing manufacturer, is set to buy Johannesburg-based men's clothing manufacturer Cutrite. The following cautionary notice released by both companies last week warning shareholders that negotiations were in progress.

No reference was made to any company, but sources confirmed at the weekend that a deal was pending between the two clothing manufacturers. Cutrite has been selling assets since it reported its results for the year to February, when attributable income rose 67% to R3.9m on sales of R57.8m.

It said in June that it had sold its Diva Fashion division—a wholly owned subsidiary which manufactures ladies' apparel—to Magear Investments for R4.1m.

Searl chairman Aaron Searl would say only that the group was on the verge of an acquisition.

For the year to June, Searl reported a 51.8% increase in attributable earnings to R42.8m on turnover of R1.46bn.
Clothing industry says no to loan scheme

Yuri Thumbran

THE Clothing Federation (Clofed) has given the thumbs-down to the financial package announced last week by the Industrial Development Corporation, saying it held no advantages for the industry.

Clofed executive director Henne van Zyl said the financial package intended to help companies which needed technological upgrading during the clothing and textile phase-down period of seven years, and it would be more beneficial to the textile industry.

"The clothing industry is labour intensive compared to the capital intensive textile industry," he said.

The loan scheme does not give any benefit to us due to the fact that the clothing industry does not invest heavily in plant and equipment," he said.

The package was part of the supply side measures announced by government in June when the tariff phase-down period was unveiled. Both clothing and textiles had agreed to the package in the Swart panel report which investigated the industries' long term prospects in the face of tariff phase-downs.

Although the Textile Federation (Texfed) was not willing to comment, parties indicated unhappiness with the scheme because it did not offer any new incentives and was similar to existing packages.

Meanwhile, both industries and the SA Clothing and Textile Workers Union will meet department of trade and industry officials to discuss particulars of the pending preferential agreement with Zimbabwe.

Clofed deputy president Bernard Richards said a last ditch attempt would be made to sway government from implementing the scheme. Details of the scheme had not been finalised but Zimbabwe already enjoyed a 10% tariff preference into SA on its exported fabrics, 15% on clothing and 15% on yarn. As SA had raised its tariffs in 1992, Zimbabwe had asked that tariffs applicable to its exports be reduced to pre-1992 levels.

"If SA feels it has a political debt to pay to Zimbabwe, why not do it by means of cash? The preferential deal will be at the cost of jobs in SA," he said.

Texfed executive director Brian Brink said it was likely that government had heeded calls to introduce quotas on sensitive goods and needed to consult the relevant players.
Seal厅 warns against ending import duties

Emperor Commission AGAINST the Commission of Goods. This plan, first put forward by the Ministry of Finance, has been approved by the Cabinet. The plan will be implemented after the election of the new parliament.

By Ministry of Finance

We must not forget that the duties on imported goods are essential for the government's budget. Without these duties, we will have to rely on other sources of revenue, which may be unreliable and unstable.

We also need to ensure that our industries remain competitive in the global market. The duties on imported goods help to protect our domestic industries from foreign competition.

Furthermore, ending these duties would open up our market to foreign goods, which could lead to a decline in the quality of our domestic goods. It is important to maintain a balance between openness and protectionism.

In conclusion, we must be cautious when considering any changes to our import duties policy. We need to ensure that our economy remains stable and competitive, and that we do not compromise our domestic industries.

Signed,

Minister of Finance

Neighbours hold growing appeal

Yuri Humbrad

SA CLOTHING companies were exploring opportunities of relocating operations to neighbouring countries to cut costs in the face of stiff competition from growing imports, Clothing Federation executive director Henne van Zyl said.

Van Zyl said Pepkor's announcement about possible plans to relocate low-value manufacturing units of Pep Manufacturing, SA's second largest clothing operation, outside SA was no surprise.

Various manufacturers were looking at the option of improving competitiveness through cost efficiencies to withstand the ramp-up of imports to SA.

SA manufacturers faced a disadvantage in having to compete against countries where production costs, especially labour, were much cheaper. Relocating to pay lower wages was a worldwide trend, especially in "the EU, the US and in Pacific Rim countries".

SA manufacturers were eyeing Zimbabwe, Mozambique and Lesotho, among others, for relocation.

Van Zyl said companies planned to manufacture fabrics in neighbouring states, export the products to SA, and from there export to world markets.

Textile Federation executive director Brian Brink said "textile firms could not relocate easily because of the plant and machinery involved, but a small number of companies was likely to relocate."
Clothing export slump feared

Business Editor  P&L  26/10/95

EXPORTS in the first four months of Rex Trueform's new financial year are down on year-ago levels and are unlikely to recover this year, according to chairman Stewart Shub.

But, Mr Shub told the annual meeting in Salt River yesterday, strong domestic demand had more than compensated for the fall in exports and total sales for the year so far were up 23 percent.

He attributed the clothing group's poor export performance to the over-hasty removal of export incentives.

"I'm not against the phasing down of benefits, but it must be done at the same pace as reducing the anti-export bias in the economy, which these incentives were designed to compensate. The results of that are not through yet," Mr Shub said, accusing the government of "putting the cart before the horse."

He said Rex Trueform, like most other clothing manufacturers, was suffering from competition from illegal imports.

On clothing imports from Zimbabwe, Mr Shub had been in favour of special tariffs, provided Zimbabwe also opened its market to South African exports and provided there were strict quantitative controls.

"Zimbabwe has bilateral agreements with other countries so without proper controls it could be a conduit for volumes of goods from other places, especially at the lower end of the market."

"There could be a flood of imports. We must be careful."

He said only goods with "at least 75 percent" value added in Zimbabwe should qualify for the lower tariffs.

"We must help Zimbabwe, but we can't help the whole of Africa," Mr Shub said.

Seeff Holdings has expanded its auction business with the acquisition of Leavo Auctions, a month after buying Boland Bank's auction division. Chief executive Errol Finkelstein said the two business would dovetail neatly, each operating independently but under the Seeff Auctions name.

Netsector Datatec's attributable profits shot up 81 percent to R1.4 million in the six months ended August. Newly established Internet services provider Pipex, set up in March this year in partnership with listed British group Unipalm Pipex, showed a loss of R431 000. Further losses of R2 million were expected in the current year as Pipex invests heavily in infrastructure, but the division should contribute to profits the year after, Datatec said.

Malbank raised shareholders' profits 23 percent to R510 million for the year ended August, in spite of slower growth in consumer spending in the second half-year.
Clothing sector faces job cuts

BY SHELLEY JONES  STAFF WRITER

The clothing sector is set to lose at least 30,000 jobs by the end of this year, according to medium and small clothing manufacturers who face almost certain closure as they lack the financial muscle to follow large manufacturers' relocation to neighbouring states.

In addition to announcements by Pep and Seardel, rumours are rife that a number of other major employers, including the AM Moolla group headed by the South African Clothing Federation (Clofed) president, Sadiq Vahed, are considering across-border subcontracting.

A spokesman for manufacturers in KwaZulu Natal, who intend meeting with unions for support and setting up an independent employers forum to discuss the issue, described the recent announcements as disgusting.

"It comes down to a rape of the whole system and will mean no further investment in South Africa. From a business point of view, it may make sense to decrease labour costs, but you have to draw the line somewhere," he said.

Hennie van Zyl, Clofed's executive director, this week disclosed that Clofed was devising a southern African trade strategy, despite protests against the government reinstating a preferential trade policy with Zimbabwe, and agreed that this would result in job losses.

However, he said this would be a short-term problem. Once the local clothing industry is restructured to manufacture quality, high fashion garments for niche markets and left budget production to neighbouring states, there would be sustainable job creation.

He said this would enable the local industry to become more competitive and secure a greater slice of the $200 billion international clothing trade, of which Africa as a whole boasts less than 0.1 percent.

Van Zyl said that Clofed's opposition to the pending Zimbabwean deal was that it appeared to be an ad hoc measure which might not fit into either a regional or international trade strategy.

South African Clothing and Textile Workers Union spokesman Mark Bennett said while he agreed with Clofed on this score, this was a far wider and more complex issue.

Clothing makers lack incentives

CAPE BUSINESS EDITOR

Opportunities for South African clothing manufacturers to work as subcontractors for European companies were limited because the trade department had not yet allowed export incentives for this type of business, Stewart Shub, the chairman of Rex Trueform, told shareholders at the annual general meeting yesterday.

Shub said it was worthwhile for European manufacturers to send cloth to South Africa to be made up into garments by skilled workers because labour costs here were lower.

But competition for this work was fierce from countries in North Africa and the Far East, and prices had to be keen.

South African manufacturers were also handicapped by the "almost overnight" reduction in the level of the General Export Incentive Scheme (GEIS), he said.

Although levels of protection had to be reduced, this should be done more gradually to allow local companies to recover from the anti-export bias resulting from the years of isolation and over-protection.

Shub said he was "cautiously optimistic" about the current year.

Sales in the first quarter were 23 percent higher than at the same time last year.

Export sales were down on last year, as predicted, but domestic sales in retail and wholesale divisions were up.

Shub said he was in favour of a relaxation of import duties on clothing and textiles from Zimbabwe, provided a reasonable limit was put on quantities and that this trade was two-way.
Rex group optimistic on sales

CAPE TOWN — Rex TruForm Clothing expressed cautious optimism yesterday that considerable growth in its sales since its June year end could be sustained.

At the group's AGM chairman Stewart Shub said sales had grown 23% since the group's year end, 'which is considerably up on the same period last year'.

'I hope the trend will be sustained we are cautiously optimistic,' he said.

Growth had largely been restricted to domestic sales at the top end of the market, where retail outlet Queenspark was doing well.

Exports had been affected by the fact that the general export incentive scheme had been cut and that benefits were now taxable.

'We are not against the phasing down of the benefits but the pace at which government reduces the export incentive should be the pace at which it reduces the anti-export bias in the economy.'

Although policies had been created to deal with the anti-export bias, their effect was not yet being felt. It was 'like putting the cart before the horse to cut incentives overnight'.

Like other clothing manufacturers, Shub was concerned about the flood of illegal clothing imports, which he said was 'larger than anyone realises'.

This was eroding the retail market's volume base, he said. He welcomed the fact that the customs department was taking steps to halt these imports.

Shub said he would not oppose renewal of the Zimbabwe-SA trade agreement, as long as it was clear that the aim was to increase two-way trade, not just to open the SA market to Zimbabwean goods.

'There should be 'tight quantity controls' and a stipulation that Zimbabwean goods should have at least 75% value added in that country,' he said.

'Zimbabwe has trade agreements with other countries and if we are not careful, Zimbabwe could act as a conduit for volumes from other countries, eroding our volume base,' Shub said.

'Given the difficulty in controlling our border posts, we could open our borders to what could be a flood of imports.

'We must be careful,' he said — Reuters
Sactwu to tackle Pep on plan to go offshore

Business Editor

THE SA Clothing and Textile Workers’ Union (Sactwu) has asked for an urgent meeting with Pepkor chief Christo Wiese about plans to move part of Pep Stores’ production out of South Africa.

"This is an issue of national importance," Sactwu’s Ebrahim Patel said in an interview.

"It would be a scandal if companies which have made their profits from South African consumers put those same consumers out of jobs.

"Putting profits ahead of jobs is not only bad social policy, it’s disastrous economic policy because of its effects on the domestic market.

"Pepkor needs consumers, and consumers need jobs."

Mr Wiese was reported earlier this week as saying Pep might move production out of the country.

Mr Patel rejected claims that high wages made South African clothing uncompetitive.

"Our wages are a fraction of those paid by successful clothing exporters elsewhere. According to the International Apparel Federation, South Africa is in the bottom half of the table of countries.

"The problem is that the labour force has been given very little training, so there are no productivity dividends like there are in other countries."

The average Sactwu member supported five dependents, Mr Patel said. Single mothers, with children and other dependents, were a high proportion of clothing industry employees.
Levi Strauss recruits South Africans

BY FRANCOISE BOTHA

Levi Strauss, the world’s largest clothing manufacturer, was on an employ-South-Africans drive, which aimed to see staffing of the company increase to 300 over the next 18 months, said Waddell Blackwell, the managing director.

Blackwell, the only American employed by the company in South Africa, said that its first entry into the local market a year ago had seen a rapid growth in sales.

The South African market for jeans stands at more than 10 million pairs a year.

"Directed by our commercial success, we should grow our total number of employees over the next 18 months and we are staffing with a diverse mix of highly charged, qualified South Africans," he said.

Dermot Molloy, the director of Salesmark Recruitment, has been responsible for the company’s candidate screening. He said working with Levi Strauss had inspired him to look, recruit and hone aspects of the recruitment team’s skills.

He said while the recruitment industry scrutinised potential candidates before placement, they were also evaluated by their clients.

"Regular post-interview feedback on applicants gave a clear idea that we were sending people compatible with the Levi Strauss ethos."

Textile sector ‘obligated’

BY SHIRLEY JONES

Cape Town — Across-border contracting was not an issue as far as the textile sector was concerned because of logistical requirements, said Mike Hankinson, the managing director of Remtex and the vice-president of the South African Textile Federation.

However, he said, textile manufacturers had an obligation to ensure that South Africans retained their jobs should they decide to set up new plants or relocate existing operations to neighbouring states.

The real concern was the erosion of the customer bases of textile companies supplying the clothing and bed linen trades. He said fabric imported duty free from the East, cut-price labour and the importation of finished goods into South Africa did pose a risk to local industry.

Meanwhile, Bernard Richards, the joint managing director of Seardel, asked that reports that Seardel was considering subcontracting to cross-border operations be retracted. He said the matter was still open to debate.
Zimbabwean trade
details to be sewn up

John Dludlu

GOVERNMENT is to meet business and labour representatives from the clothing and textile industries tomorrow to finalise details for reinstating trade preferences for Zimbabwean exports into SA.

The meeting will focus on establishing a committee to monitor monthly trade flows and a safety mechanism to ensure Zimbabwean imports do not hit local jobs and industry — fears long expressed by business and labour.

Under the terms of the deal, Zimbabwean clothing and textile exports will have better access to SA, under an agreement that lapsed three years ago. Government has recently completed a study aimed at determining the effect of reinstating the trade regime.

Trade and industry department chief director for trade relations Fuad Ismail said yesterday that the meeting would discuss the results of the studies which showed that the effect on SA jobs would be “reasonable.”

Representatives of the Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers’ Union, the Clothing and Textile Federation of South Africa and the clothing and textile industry would be part of the committee.

Another key component would be establishing a committee — comprising government, Obesad, Textil and Sactw — to monitor the implementation of the agreement, Ismail said.

The committee would receive monthly statistics on trade between the two nations, and if a sudden surge of Zimbabwean imports was picked up, the safeguards would be activated.

Among concerns about the deal was the fear that Zimbabwean preferential access could become a conduit for cheap imports from Asian countries.

But the arrangement could also strengthen SA’s hand in talks with the European Union for better access to the 15-nation single market.

Tomorrow’s talks will be followed by another meeting with the Zimbabwean negotiators before mid-November.

The later talks are likely to focus on Sactw’s demand that the agreement includes social clauses, such as workers’ rights to strike and collective bargaining, and a ban on discrimination.

Representatives of the Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers' Union, the Clothing and Textile Federation and government negotiators would have to decide on the level of import quotas as part of a mechanism to prevent damage to the local industries.

Delswa, Jade may de-list after selloff

Clothing group Delswa would sell its operations for R21.1m in cash to a new company controlled by its current controlling shareholders, sponsoring broker Davis Borkum Hare said yesterday.

As a result, Delswa and its parent company, Jaff-Delswa Investments (Jade), would be de-listed from the JSE by mid-January and liquidated unless a buyer was found for either of the cash shells.

Jade shareholders would be offered a pre-liquidation 315c a share and Delswa shareholders would receive R3 per ordinary share. The companies said there had been little benefit in the listings as the shares were seldom traded, and the cost of maintaining the listings was unwarranted.

In addition, the transaction would provide all Jade and Delswa shareholders with the chance to realise their investment at a substantial premium on the current market price.

It’s the exception these days to hear optimism from a retail CE about the rest of his financial year. But Rex Trueform chairman, Stewart Shub, says turnover for the first four months is 23% up and retail chain Queenspark and the wholesale division have produced even higher gains.

That is encouraging when other “big guns” can only manage 15%. Moreover, Shub believes the trend can be maintained until June.

Rex Trueform’s share was R19.50 a year ago with an historical P/E of 9.6. Since then it has fallen to the equivalent of R18 (it has split four ways; current price is 450c) even though turnover rose 20% and operating income 38%. Perhaps it was the lesser 17.4% rise in EPS — constrained by a considerably higher tax rate because of exempt income (from exports) was a lower percentage of total income — which caused the market to downrate the share to present P/E of 7.5.

It is hoped that the 1995 tax rise was a one-off. This year, earnings comparison will be against the higher 1995 tax base and there is every indication pre-tax performance will be as good if not better.

Shub says reorganisation of manufacturing plant is a continuing process. Its objective is international competitiveness. The Salt River plant produces mainly high quality men’s and ladies’ tailored outerwear. The Port Elizabeth and Atlantis factories specialise in casual wear and men’s shirts.

The manufacturing division produces for three different market segments: exports, the Queenspark chain and the specialist retail trade.

Companie

Exports suffered in financial 1995 largely because of uncertainties surrounding export incentives. Following Gers reductions exporters are dependent on the anti-export bias also being lessened by a corresponding reduction of duties and surcharges on imported textiles and materials.

Shub is subdued about export prospects, but he is really upbeat about niche retailer Queenspark, which now accounts for a significant slice of turnover and profits (neither is disclosed).

In the review year Queenspark’s turnover grew by 35%. It launched its new private label card but unlike some high-profile retailers there is no sign of credit saturation among the chain’s card customers. A new store development programme is in place and information systems are continually being upgraded.

Product acceptance from outside retailers is growing ahead of budget. Shub says signs are that retailers stocking Rex Trueform products expect a buoyant festive season.

Production lines are fully booked for this financial year and the factories will operate at full capacity through to June, says Shub.

Rex Trueform is today considerably more than a clothing manufacturer. Queenspark has become a retail tour de force and will continue to grow rapidly.

If EPS move ahead by an attainable 25% to 75c the share is on a prospective P/E of 6. That is too low for a share of this calibre. If the share was listed in the retail sector its P/E would be at least double.

Textile consultants must get accreditation

BY SHIRLEY JONES

Durban — The trade and industry department has given management consultants 10 days to apply for accreditation to help administer the Duty Credit Certificate Scheme, which provides incentives for clothing and textile exporters.

Brian Bank, the president of the South African Textile Federation, said the industry supported the move. He said that when the scheme was introduced in December 1993 as part of a long-term strategic plan for the restructuring of the textile and clothing industries, there had been no conditions for the granting of export benefits.

However, from this year, participants have to achieve targets set in terms of a productivity monitoring scheme and they are required to spend at least 4 percent of their wage bill on training.

Management consultants wishing to apply for accreditation have until November 24 this year to submit applications to the trade and industry department.
No agreement on Zimbabwe textile tariffs

THE Zimbabwe and SA governments failed to reach agreement yesterday on the reinstatement of preferential tariffs on Zimbabwean exports of textiles and clothing to SA, Ziana news agency reports.

Zimbabwe's industry and commerce ministry said a meeting held in Harare had "examined the draft proposals, and agreement could not be reached on the minimum level of the local content requirement of 75% as proposed by SA and also on the extent of the envisaged preferential rebates and quota levels."

The ministry said the meeting had agreed that SA should consult further regarding outstanding issues, and that the implementation date for the proposed tariff arrangement should not be later than February 1, 1996. — Sapa.
Harare — The Zimbabwe National Chamber of Commerce (ZNCC) is disappointed that Zimbabwe and South Africa failed to reach an agreement on Monday to re-introduce the preferential tariffs on Zimbabwean exports of textiles and clothing to South Africa.

ZNCC news agency reports that the head of the ZNCC economic division, Edmore Tobanwa, said yesterday that the stalemate was a major blow to the future of the local textile and clothing industry, which is going through a serious viability crisis.

Imports of clothing and textile products into South Africa attract a punitive 90 percent duty.

Figures showed that in 1994 Zimbabwe exported goods worth Z$1.9 billion to South Africa and imports from that country stood at Z$6 billion.

South Africa was also exporting close to Z$40 billion to the rest of Africa with imports pegged at Z$4 billion.

"These statistics show that trade is lopsided in South Africa's favour, a situation that is unsustainable in the long run," Tobanwa said.

"There is need for South Africa to open up its borders and to avoid "milking" the rest of Africa to death," he added.

This week's meeting followed one held in Pretoria in August, but could not agree on the minimum level of the local content proposed by South Africa or the extent of the envisaged preferential rebates and the quota levels South Africa wants a local content of 75 percent.

The meeting agreed South Africa should consult further on the outstanding issues, and the proposed tariffs should be implemented no later than February 1, 1996.
Trade concessions under fire from King

Yuri Thumbran

SA's decision to improve preferential trade agreements with neighbouring countries, especially Zimbabwe, came under fire from Frame group chairman Mervyn King at the textile group's AGM in Durban yesterday.

King said the over-hasty willingness to improve trade preferences was of concern. In the case of Malawi, one of SA's largest end-user manufacturers had already relocated the larger part of its manufacturing base to Malawi.

"This has happened because there is an ability to import fabrics into Malawi free of duty, add value of not less than 25% and then export the product back to SA free of duty. There are no quotas in regard to exports into SA from Malawi," he said.

He warned of creating a precedent, as other countries north of SA's borders were also knocking on the door to obtain preferential entry into the SA market. Another problem was that any quota arrangement would be ineffective without adequate customs policing.

He urged the authorities to re-evaluate the duty-free imports from Malawi and the free entry of goods from Zimbabwe into the SA Customs Union through Botswana and Namibia.

"All these matters must be carefully evaluated before the trade and industry department arrives at any final agreements with these countries."

King said the department of trade and industry should not be driven by political imperatives, but by financial ones. The textiles sector was committed to playing a significant role in SA.
Unions to move on liquidations

(184) ARG 25/11/95

ALIDE DASNOIS
Business Editor

AS the Western Cape braces for the annual wave of liquidations of small clothing companies, trade unions have launched a campaign to get the Insolvency Act changed to give workers a better deal if their employers go bust.

The SA Clothing and Textile Workers’ Union (Sactwu) has put forward proposed changes to the Act to Cosatu, which has agreed to take up the issue. Sactwu’s Ebrahim Patel told Weekend Argus:

In terms of the Act, which specifies how the assets of a company must be divided among those who have claims against it, workers’ wages were only paid out once the state and the sequestrators had each taken their cut, he said.

“We are asking for workers’ earnings to receive preference. This means not only wages but also other earnings such as contractual bonuses and savings which have been deducted during the year.”

At present bonuses and savings could be treated as concurrent claims, right at the bottom of the list, he said.

Sactwu was also asking for trade unions to be notified when an application for liquidation was pending.

“This means we can deal early with the option of judicial management and see if the company can trade its way out of the difficulty with a temporary respite from creditors,” Mr Patel said.

“It’s not just a matter of cutting the cake so the workers get their fair share. It’s also a question of keeping the bakery going.”

Mr Patel said closures of small clothing factories in the Christmas period heightened the need to change the Act.

“We know of two liquidations already in the past two weeks,” said Wayne van der Rheede, Sactwu’s Cape regional secretary.

“And it will speed up. This always happens at this time of year.”

Sometimes employers keep workers on the payroll until just before Christmas, knowing they won’t be able to pay them or give them bonuses then at the last minute they say there’s no money.”

Cape Town liquidators confirmed that this was a recurring problem.

“It happens every year in the clothing and footwear industries,” said one liquidator who preferred not to be named.

“We find directors of small companies who keep staff on and buy materials to finish off orders before Christmas, break for the holidays and then pull the plug on the company while the workers are away.”

Keeping workers on the staff in the knowledge that the company was to be liquidated could constitute fraud, he said.

But this was difficult to prove, especially in “friendly liquidations” triggered by directors themselves or by a creditor nominated by them.

He could not estimate the number of employees affected each year.

Industrial council data on the Western Cape clothing industry show 50 044 people were employed in October, compared to 47 591 in November last year and 49 543 last December. But these figures do not necessarily reflect employment patterns in smaller companies because companies employing five people or fewer are not obliged to comply with industrial council agreements.
One aim of this requirement was to prevent products from other countries in the Far East or elsewhere from entering South Africa duty free via Zimbabwe. Clofed executive director Henne van Zyl said:

Dr Richards said South African manufacturers paid duty on fabric bought in other countries and brought into South Africa. The duty increased the cost of the commodity. If Zimbabwe was allowed to export garments to South Africa made from imported fabric, Zimbabwe wouldn't have to pay duty on what would be finished goods, irrespective of the content.

This would give Zimbabwe an unfair advantage over South Africa. That advantage would translate into the loss of as many as 1,000 jobs in the clothing industry alone, which currently employed about 160,000 people, he said.

In the most recent round of talks between the two countries, Zimbabwe balked at the 75 percent local content requirement, calling it too onerous. The South African government has now asked the clothing and textile industries here to review that requirement and possibly lower the percentage.

"We are duty bound to review the issue, but that doesn't mean we will accede to Zimbabwe," said Mr Van Zyl.

Whether or not Clofed would reduce the local content quantity would depend on feedback it got from its members, he said.

"We will go back to the department next week to say we can accommodate a slightly lower percentage or we can't." The local content requirement was non-negotiable, said Brian Brink, executive director of the National Textile Federation (Textfed).

"Zimbabwe seems to have a problem with what we thought shouldn't be a very difficult condition. It makes me suspicious as to what they intend to export to South Africa. Maybe it is from China or Pakistan."

He said the major components of the costs of making anything in textiles in particular would be raw materials and labour.

"Any trade agreement like this should be to develop the domestic industry and create jobs for Zimbabweans."

Mr Brink said his industry's response to Pretoria had been made.

"Now Harare and Pretoria will get together again, to try to finalise the agreement by February."

The clothing industry's response could differ from that of the textile industry, because "clothing is distinctly different from textiles", said Mr Van Zyl.

There were different local content requirements in the current agreement for clothing and textiles, he said.

Representatives of the SA Clothing and Textile Workers' Union could not be reached for comment yesterday.
Giant clothing factory seeks freeze on wages

By TOM HOOD

A THREE-YEAR wage freeze is being sought at a giant Cape clothing factory as part of a plan to reduce costs and save 2500 jobs.

There are fears in the industry that the move could spark similar demands for wage freezes by smaller clothing companies, whose wage bills amount to 70 percent of their costs.

Workers at the Parow factory of Pep Manufacturing have been warned that the business could become another casualty of the flood of cheap imports entering the country.

Textile manufacturers say they have been forced to act because of dumped goods threatening to disrupt the local market and engulf the country’s clothing trade.

The wage freeze proposal has been severely criticised by the giant Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers Union (SACTWU).

The union accused Pep Manufacturing — part of Pepkor, the country’s largest retail group — of dealing in bad faith and being “provocative in the extreme.”

Pep Manufacturing — which is said to operate independently of Pep Stores — says it will apply to the Industrial Council for the Cape Clothing Industry next month for exemptions from wages and other agreements.

Wayne van der Rheede, the regional secretary of the Western Cape region of SACTWU, said his union would fight the company’s wage freeze proposals “with vigour and determination.”

Mr van der Rheede said the company had never officially informed the union of its intentions, which came at a time when discussions on a wide range of related issues were taking place.

The company is asking for:

- Permission to continue the current wage rates, which were increased on July 1, for 12 months.
- Exemption from paying Clothing Industry Training Board levies because the company claims it has developed its own scheme to train 1200 machinists this year as well as supervisors.
- Reduction in levies to the industry’s sick fund.
- An extension of the working week with overtime paid only after an employer has worked a full week. They also want to pay for only six public holidays, with the rest being worked at normal time.

A leading Salt River manufacturer said: “If the industry makes a precedent here, there will be a flood of applications.

“Companies must stick to agreements with the union and industrial council.”

Factory shutdown may axe 1,500 jobs

Renee Grawitzky

THE AM Moolla group, owned by National Clothing Federation of SA (Clofed) president Sadek Vahed, plans to close a factory in northern KwaZulu-Natal, resulting in 1,500 job losses.

Vahed, Moolla’s chairman and CEO, said the closure of the Isithebe plant would result in 1,500 retrenchments. The SA Clothing and Textile Workers Union (Sactwu) said AM Moolla had given the union notice of its intention to retrench its workers on December 8.

The union said discussions were taking place with the company in an attempt to postpone the retrenchments. If this was not achieved, the union would oppose them.

Moolla’s announcement comes in the wake of reports that major textile manufacturers intend to open up operations in neighbouring states including Malawi, Zimbabwe and Botswana.

The union said the Botswana government, in the recent Clofed publication, had advertised various incentives to encourage potential clothing manufacturers, including labour stability and wages of R1,76 per hour.

Shutdown

But Vahed denied rumours that he intended opening up operations in a neighbouring state.

He attributed the decision to close the factory to a sharp decline in export business, the “explosion of illegal imports of clothing and fabrics, which has had a negative effect on our budget and clothing sales”, the seven-year tariff reform programme regarding imported fabrics, and government’s decision to reject the clothing industry’s request to extend current export incentives to value-added garments.

He said that the new tariff structure had “already spawned a huge underground system, where goods brought in without duties being paid are hitting the streets at well below our fabric costs”.

In evidence presented during public hearings to the labour market commission, Cosatu general secretary Sam Shilowa mentioned AM Moolla’s decision to close the Isithebe factory as an example of how wage restraint did not guarantee jobs.

In an attempt to save the jobs of its members, the union had agreed to wages well below the industry minimum, Shilowa said.
Neighbours blamed for textile crisis

Durban - Contrary to popular belief, Durban is not the chief port of entry for the masses of illegal clothing and textile imports that threaten to overwhelm the South African clothing industry, a new report says.

According to the National Clothing Federation of South Africa (Clofed), the other South African ports also feature prominently as well as customs bonded warehouses in Johannesburg and Pretoria.

But the chief problem is smuggling through the neighbouring countries of Zimbabwe, Malawi, Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland and Namibia.

Clofed notes that according to the trade and industry department, the inability of the customs and excise department to control illegal imports has become a crisis. At least 30 percent of all containers entering South Africa slip past customs officials.

In the five most common import scams identified in the Clofed document, customs officials often co-operate in the fraudulent activities.

By arrangement with the Department of Trade and Industry, some clothing and textiles may enter South Africa with a nominal customs tariff of 3 percent, however, 10 to 20 times more than is allowed enters South Africa illegally.

The Clofed report adds that this is done with the help of officials who do not cancel permits that have been fully used, they are then fraudulently used over and over again.

Clothing and textiles from the Far East that are disguised as having been made in Mozambique also enter the South African market regularly.

Clofed says Malawi is the worst offender, "This route has grown out of all proportion in the last two years."
Layoffs at Mooolla
‘the first of many’

BY SHERILY JONES

Durban — The AM Mooolla Group, which is to retrench 1 500 workers at seven factories across KwaZulu Natal, will be the first of many to lay off workers early next year to cope with problems such as cross-border competition, industry officials say.

Sadek Vahed, the company head and the National Clothing Federation president, said 10 to 15 percent of the region’s workforce of 37,000 would probably become redundant within months. He said he knew of three major manufacturers who were planning to follow the group’s lead.

Referring to lay-offs at the group’s Inthabhe and Hammarsdale plants and its five Ulundi operations, Vahed said that the company had reached the point where a strategic decision to cut production capacity and rationalise operations had become unavoidable if it were to pre-empt expected difficult business conditions during the first half of next year.

“You can’t run plants without work,” he said, pointing out that rather than closing operations to open cross-border plants, the company was in the throes of moving into value-added niche markets.

Some plants that were operating under difficult circumstances could not be absorbed and retrenchments were the only option, Vahed said. He blamed illegal imports for much of the trouble.

The group, which had exported more than R75 million worth of goods to the United States, the EU, Russia and Kazakhstan, had seen orders dwindle because of the local industry’s inability to remain competitive. This, together with heightened illegal imports, had had a negative effect on the company’s budget and end sales.

“With an era ge import duties of about 85 percent since the first phase-down promulgated on September 1 on budget-end fabric imports, we are being priced out of the market.

“To add insult to injury, additional new duties on imported fabrics were discreetly slipped in by the trade and industry department, with pressure from the Textile Federation under the guise of rationalisation of the various tariff headings,” Vahed said.

He said that any country with high tariffs for long periods encouraged cheating. This had spawned a dual economy in South Africa — the official one and an underground economy which had had a particularly serious effect on the clothing industry.

Incentives

Vahed said that the need to retrench staff could have been avoided had the government not rejected the clothing industry’s plea to extend export incentives to value-added garments, known as the duty-credit certificate scheme.

This allows for cut, make and trim processing of goods in South Africa for large European and American clients. “Much of the group’s idle production capacity could have been utilised to manufacture large volume export orders that were in the pipeline if the benefits for such exports had been introduced,” he said.

Vahed said should the government reconsider key policy decisions and plug illegal imports within the next six to nine months, there was a chance the clothing industry could recover.

Clothing exports set to increase

Cape Town — SA clothing exports are expected to total R500m in 1995 from R430m in 1994, Clothing Federation executive director Henrie van Zyl says. "Clothing industry production volumes increased by a healthy 3% in 1994, and are expected to increase by a further 6% to 7% in calendar 1995," Van Zyl says in his annual report for the year to September 30 1995.

"The outlook for the industry for 1996 is equally bullish, provided the SA government manages to effectively control the increased incidence of illegal imports."

Van Zyl says exports can be even higher if government provides certainty about export incentives and the opening up of the domestic market. — Reuter.
Clofed scheme aims to create 100,000 jobs

By Shirley Jones

Durban — Despite recently announced job cuts, the National Clothing Federation of South Africa (Clofed) has proposed a scheme aimed at creating 100,000 jobs within four years.

The new jobs would increase employment in the clothing sector by more than 40 percent over the period.

This job creation package will be discussed at a meeting between Clofed, the Department of Trade and Industry and labour at a meeting scheduled for December 12.

This "surprise" meeting is expected to shed new light, and may even produce a longing for a change of heart, on export incentives rejected by the Department of Trade and Industry in June this year.

According to Clofed's outgoing president, Sadek Vahed, this led to a "Berlin Wall-type non-competitive position" for local manufacturers.

In contrast, the industry's "relatively straightforward plan" hinges on developing export business either directly or via large companies sub-contracting to small and micro-enterprises.

Duties

As things stand, in terms of obtaining Duty Credit Certificates (DCC) local clothing manufacturers exporting clothing made from locally produced fabric or imported fabric on which duties have been paid receive a rebate worth 30 percent of export value.

The problem, says Vahed, is that should local clothing manufacturers import raw materials duty free, the DCC incentive falls away.

He stresses that although clothing manufacturers, in this instance, are able to obtain fabric at world prices, they are still confronted with an anti-export bias in the form of other manufacturing and distribution costs. These are, in turn, compounded by higher customs duties than their southern African counterparts when exporting clothing to the UK, European Union and certain other countries.

"Probably the most important reason for requesting the extension of the DCC system to all types of clothing manufacture is the rapid growth of outsourcing or so-called offshore manufacturing."

More and more large retailers or clothing manufacturers prefer to obtain their fabric overseas and ship it to manufacturers in South Africa after local companies make up the clothing, it is then re-exported.

Vahed says this type of cut, make and trim is the fastest growing segment of the mammoth $150 billion-a-year international clothing trade. By securing just a small piece of this, the local clothing industry could create many jobs in a relatively short period.
Relisted Coastal still has problems

DURBAN — Clothing company Coastal Clothing Manufacturers, which had discontinued trading for a time, posted a R1,3m loss for the six months to August, MD Rajen Pillay said.

The company recorded a corresponding loss of 3,23c a share and no dividend was declared.

Comparative figures for the six months to August 1994 were not available as this was the revised company's first year of operation. The company was suspended from the JSE in 1993.

Coastal went into provisional liquidation in 1993 and was relisted on the JSE in April after a takeover by the Indonesian-based Polysindo/Textmeco Group.

The company was repositioned as a producer of quality polyester fabrics and garments through a R23,5m share capital rescue package.

During the period under review Coastal acquired the Progress Knitting Mills premises in Hammarsdale for R3,5m. Another R5m is being spent on refurbishing the factory into an art printing, dyeing and finishing plant. Coastal would establish a weaving facility in Botswana with the Botswana Development Corporation.
Sactwau starts campaign to protect jobs

Renee Gravitzky

Sactwau has attributed job losses to the increase of illegal imports, mainly through Durban port, unbalanced preferential trade agreements such as the one with Zimbabwe, limited or no government support for restructuring industries to help them become competitive, the relocation of manufacturers to low-wage areas outside the country, and the lack of support for the inclusion of a social clause in trade agreements.

The union said Durban harbour authorities had confiscated at least 660 tons of illegally imported clothing and 200 tons of illegal textile fibre in recent months. Rampant corruption and inadequate security measures at ports had exacerbated the problem of illegal imports.

Sactwau assistant general secretary Ebrahim Patel said a meeting would be held with government early next month to discuss the crisis in the industry.

Patel said the union would resist moves by companies to relocate production facilities outside the country. "If manufacturers take a decline in duties as a license to retrench and move out, then we are heading for a train smash," he said. However, the union would be supportive if companies setting up operations in other countries maintained their productive base in SA.

Previous reports said the union would meet Pepkor to discuss its plans to move parts of its operations out of SA. In addition, it was reported that Pepkor intended applying for an exemption from the Industrial Council man Agreement for a three-year wage freeze.

The company said the report had pre-empted any formal discussion with the union on this proposal.

Patel said the issue was raised at a Cape Clothing Manufacturers' Association general meeting, which was an "extreme act of bad faith" by the company and an attempt to put political pressure on the union to accept a low-wage strategy for the industry.
Clothing tycoon warns about high labour costs

Nicola Jenvey

DURBAN — Clothing Federation (Clofed) outgoing president Sadok Vahed yesterday blamed trade unions for excessive labour cost increases, saying the industry's quest for international competitiveness would be permanently damaged if the situation was left unchecked.

He told Clofed's AGM that soaring illegal imports, disappointing exports and the relocation of local clothing manufacturers to neighbouring countries were all having a damaging effect on the industry.

The recent 13% wage increase was almost twice the current inflation rate, he said.

However, high tariffs on raw materials accounted for about 60% of the industry's current uncompetitiveness.

Vahed said that although jobs would be lost by lowering tariff duties on fibres, yarn and loomstate fabric, new ones would be created by a larger clothing industry.

"If we want our industry's economic stagnation to stop, our economy must grow not in a capital-intensive direction but in a labour-intensive one," Vahed said.

He said industry survival depended on growing SA's current 0.1% share of the R1 000bn per annum international clothing trade.

During 1995 Clofed had established an SA clothing and textile export council which would hopefully be funded through a statutory 0.5% levy on the duty credit certificate benefits on clothing exports.

Vahed said that he believed the industry's fragmentation was a major disadvantage when dealing with more cohesive industries, trade unions and government.

Leaders could not assume office in the industry at national or regional level if they did not distinguish between personal interests and those of the whole federation.

Although Clofed was attempting to recruit members from within the small medium and micro-enterprise sector, static membership figures had indicated that the drive had still to bear fruit, Vahed said.
No go for Ensign, Mnyama

Edward West

CAPE TOWN — Negotiations between the clothing group Ensign and the new Western Cape-based black business grouping Mnyama had been terminated, Ensign chairman and MD Ronald Roy said yesterday.

Responding to recent speculation that Mnyama might be heading for a speedy listing via a takeover of the struggling Ensign group, Roy said, "we were negotiating at one stage, but these have fallen through."

He declined to give reasons for the breakdown in negotiations.

Other options were being pursued, but Roy said he would discuss these only when finalised.

In the six months to June, Ensign reported a loss of R22 million, compared with a loss of R126 million at the same time in the previous year.

Meanwhile, the Mnyama group — managed by management consultant Peter Jones and Khayelitsha businessman Sum Dube for the past six months — unveiled plans of major projects in which it planned to participate.

One such plan was to bid for a Western Cape casino licence in a joint venture with African Sun — the black consortium formed with Sun International — with the aim to expand casino licences nationally.

Meanwhile, Sun International regional director Ian Douglas said the company and its partners had been in discussions with a number of different groupings, but no announcement had been made on any partnership structures in the Western Cape.

Another project Mnyama unveiled last week was the expansion of Cape Town’s harbour for commercial fishing, with associated manufacturing facilities, in collaboration with a number of Japanese investors.

A Portnet spokesman confirmed that methods were being sought to fund such a project, a feasibility study was being planned, and Japanese investors were keen to bring black investors and small business into the deal. Mnyama was one of those organisations approached.

"It is still very early days yet on this project," he said.
Seardel rule out staff changes at Cam

THE purchase by Cape Town-based Seardel Investment Corporation of Cutrite Apparel Manufacturers (Cam) in Johannesburg, will not change the management or staff components of the new acquisition, says Bernard Richards, joint managing director of Seardel.

"Seardel's policy is that individually-operating divisions are responsible for their own operations," Dr Richards said.

The purchase price of R16 million for Cam - whose net asset value is set at R19.45 million by next February - was the result of a lot of negotiation from both sides, he said.

"At the end both parties were comfortable that a fair price was achieved," he said.

The addition of Cam's Johannesburg factory to Seardel's many factories - in Cape Town, Durban and Johannesburg - would be an asset.

"The company is well managed and has strong brand names in Cutrite, Cutwood and Cutrochelli," Dr Richards said.

Cam was a major player in the men's trouser market, he said.

Payment for Cam would be through the issue of 19.5 million Seardel ordinary shares and 5.5 million "Ny" ordinary shares at 210c each to holding company Cutrite Investments."
400 angry workers besiege hosiery mill

NORMAN JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

The manager and staff of an Elsies River clothing company were holed up behind locked doors today to avoid more than 400 angry workers, who fear they have lost their holiday pay and savings.

The company, Knitmaster Hosiery Mills in Constam Road, was recently put under provisional liquidation.

The workers claimed their weekly wages were not paid on Friday and that today they arrived at work to find all the gates closed.

Chaos erupted in front of the main entrance when workers realised that the manager, Hipokrates Zafropoulos, had locked himself and other office staff in the building.

Elsies River police, backed by the Internal Stability Division, restored order after employees tried to break down the gates.

Detective-sergeant Eddie Edwards and the workers' attorney Rustadene Rudolph tried unsuccessfully on their cell phones to persuade Mr Zafropoulos to open the gates so that negotiations could begin.

A delegation of the South African Clothing Textile Workers Union (Sactwu), Bishop Lavis ANC chairman Abdol Abrahams, Communist Party negotiator Lesley Fick and Mr Rudolph tried unsuccessfully several times to speak to members of the company's management on cellphones.
Clothing Workers "Poised Over Axe"
Clothing industry at stalemate on rebates

By SHILOH JONES

Durban — The clothing industry's plea for the extension of current export incentives met with little success last week.

At a meeting which ended in a stalemate, the government, the Clothing Federation (Clofed) the Textile Federation (Texted) and the South African Clothing and Textile Workers Union, discussed the extension of the Duty Credit Certificate rebate scheme, which allows South African manufacturers to import fabric duty free under item 470.03, provided it is used for garments which are re-exported.

Clofed argues that should this be extended to cover the value-added content of garments manufactured for export as well as to outsource (garments manufactured from fabric supplied and owned by international retailers and brought in under item 470.01), twice the number of jobs lost to the industry this year could be re-created.

At a conservative estimate, Clofed expects between 6 000 and 10 000 jobs to result from every R100 million of contract work.

Incoming president Bernard Richards says that this approach provides a whole new angle for the clothing industry, a fail-safe and legitimate means of moving into the international market.

He warns that if South African manufacturers do not take advantage of this growing international trend — 10 years ago European countries outsourced just 20 percent of production against 50 percent today — they could be cut out of the international clothing loop.

Textile manufacturers argue that this system is prejudicial to their interests, but Richards says that the majority of work would utilise fabrics which are not manufactured in South Africa. In addition, Clofed argues that the clothing industry imports just 30 percent of the fabric it uses. Compared with the output of the textile industry, this constitutes less than 15 percent of overall production. Additional imports would therefore be negligible.

Leaks

Richards acknowledges stories of both fabrics and garments leaking into the South African market, and says Clofed intends investigating this. However, he insists that as far as 470.01 goes, leaks could be easily checked. He says the clothing industry is volunteering to pay duties and collect refunds only once goods have been re-exported.

For its part, Texted argues that fabric generally makes up 50 percent of the total cost of clothing. Thus clothing worth at least double that of textiles brought in under 470.03 should be exported.

However, according to Texted, from July 1993 the ratio of knitted fabric imports to knitted clothing exports has been more than 65 percent, fuelling speculation that large volumes of either imported fabric or made-up clothing is being sold on the local market.

Texted points out that the ratio for woven fabric imports to woven clothing exports is also very high, at more than 65 percent.

According to Texted, 470.03 permits issues have also been studied and a number of discrepancies have been discovered.
Angry workers seize machines

By Simon Zwane

WORKERS in a clothing factory in Durban, angry at their boss for disappearing without paying them their bonus and three weeks' wages, impounded machinery from the factory yesterday.

The 50 Errus Clothing employees came to work on Wednesday and were shocked to discover that the factory had been closed and the boss, Mr Robert Moodie, had disappeared.

They then proceeded to Glenwood intending to stage a sit-in at Moodie's house. However they found that the house they had gone to did not belong to him but to a Professor Ross.

Southern African Clothing and Textile Workers Union organizer Mr Alvan Pillay said the workers had then gone to the house of Mr C Iyre, a member of a closed corporation that controlled the factory.

Iyre went to the factory with the workers and opened the factory, allowing the workers to take 23 machines. Pillay said Iyre had also signed a letter confirming that he was present when the machines were taken until money owed to them was paid.

Pillay said the workers were owed about R150 000 in wages.
Clothing firms hold a key to job-creation

Business Reporter

As the most labour-intensive industry in South Africa, the clothing industry is a key in overcoming the high levels of unemployment, says Bernard Richards of Cape Town, newly elected president of the Clothing Federation of South Africa (Clofed).

But the potential for job-creation depends on the satisfactory resolution of several major issues facing the industry in the next two years, Dr Richards said in his first speech as president.

Because consumers in the year 2000 will demand more and more quality for the value of the product, both the national clothing and textile industries would have to become more competitive against foreign imports, he said.

"Our opportunity in the South African market is our closeness to our retail customers who are in the business of supplying their fickle customer with what the customer wants, not what the retailer happens to have in stock or the manufacturer happens to manufacture."

In addition, unfair competition resulting from fraudulent imports, he said, had welcomed the planned imposition by Customs and Excise of a 125 percent duty in South Africa, but deplored the delay to February in implementing the duty.

The emptying of containers en route through South Africa had become one of the major means of circumventing import duties, and it was hoped the planned deposit would put a stop to that form of fraud, Dr Richards said.

Another major issue was the promotion of exports.

"The export drive will be further enhanced by our efforts to stage exhibitions in South Africa as well as by participating in overseas exhibitions."

The Department of Trade and Industry could help by marketing the 1996 South African international clothing exhibition abroad.

"Efforts to establish a South African Clothing and Textile Export Council (SACTEC) will continue and a response from the DTI on funding proposals is awaited."

SACTEC would play a pivotal role in enabling the clothing and textile industries to become effective participants in the global market.

The Clothing Federation viewed as vital the promotion of small business and would continue to actively participate in the development and promotion of small, medium and micro enterprises.

To this end the federation was actively involved in developing an initiative in conjunction with the national Textile Federation to create manufacturing technology centres and local business service centres.

The clothing industry had to be pro-active in creating a Southern African Preferential Trade Area (SAPTA).

Until a SAPTA was in place, the clothing industry had to resist the ad hoc extension of preferential duties to Zimbabwe, Dr Richards said.

The extension of a Zimbabwe model to other southern African countries would be disastrous unless proper customs controls were in place in all countries. The South African Customs Union has been extended to those countries.

"The anomalies of goods from Malawi having preferential access to South Africa, as well as Zimbabwean goods having preferential access via Botswana and Namibia, needs to be eliminated."

On the issue of labour costs, Dr Richards said business and job creation thrived best when active efforts were made to remove uncertainty.

"The new Labour Relations Act has introduced numerous areas of uncertainty into labour relations, particularly in the realm of operational decision-making."

He urged Nedlac to "rationalize" however it could to create a climate where the economy could grow.

While the clothing industry was well aware of the need for appropriate training and the pivotal role training played in making the industry internationally competitive, there was a need "to guard against the growing tendency to incorporate social needs within the training ambit," he said.

Economies did not work by social accord, but by people seeing advantages and taking gaps.

On the issue of labour costs, he said a clothing industry wage settlement in 1995 was "about double the South African inflation rate" when the rand/dollar exchange rate were stable.

"In the international clothing industry, the quest for high wages linked to high value-added as a means to create jobs is a pipe dream."

On investor perception, he said the average price/earnings ratios of clothing shares quoted on the JSE were among the lowest in all industry groups.

"We do not deserve this ranking. It means that the cost of capital to our industry is inordinately high and affects not only listed companies but all clothing companies seeking bank and other forms of credit."

If these issues could be addressed positively and resolved satisfactorily in the next two years, the seeds would have been sown for a good base from which to grow and create jobs. Dr Richards said.

Top business park, The Waterway in Mowbray, is to be extended at a cost of R5 million to meet demand.

'IT'S GROWING'

'The Waterway' is a business sector of the Irvinel Developments, a local firm with the aim of creating business parks. It is located in the area of the Mowbray and is to be extended at a cost of R5 million. The extension project, according to the developer, is to accommodate the growing business needs of the area. The extension will be completed in the near future.
